Nobody was happy with the necessity of this solo expedition, except perhaps Raine herself. She had already risked capture or worse once before; she had already secured food and extra clothes and the weapon she now wielded, not to mention how she’d led Lozzie back to safety. She had done more than enough, the night wasn’t getting any younger, and we all needed rest. Her included. Raine was not superhuman, no matter how she liked to present herself. She did not have to offer herself up to the task.

But the tapping on the radiator pipes was a clue with a time limit.

A seven-tap pattern, though what it meant was anybody’s guess. Evelyn said it didn’t correspond to any magical symbolic system she was aware of; Raine said it wasn’t Morse Code. Lozzie could only attest that it was most certainly not a ‘funky beat’. We even had the Fox listen to it, by encouraging her over to the radiator where the tapping was most clearly heard, but she was uninterested and did not respond.

The tapping only came at night, not during the daylight. I could not recall ever hearing it during my long initial exploration of the dream-spaces of Cygnet Hospital. If we waited for morning, the trail might well go cold, leaving us with an unsolved mystery for the next night — and who knew if we would even make it to another dusk?

We needed every advantage we could get, every possible ally we could find, to exploit every chink in the institution’s armour.

We had to investigate this tonight, while darkness still lay upon Cygnet Asylum.

But we could not safely creep through the midnight halls with Evelyn’s wheelchair, not without the cover of the riot to distract the nurses and mask our passage. Evee would have to stay behind — but leaving her by herself was unthinkable, she would be defenceless; there was absolutely no way I was leaving Evelyn’s side in this place. We couldn’t leave her with Lozzie, either — not because I believed that Lozzie was a threat to Evee, even in Lozzie’s altered state, but because if a staff member wandered into the locker room again, Evee would need help hiding, as I had achieved previously. I wasn’t quite certain that Lozzie was capable of doing that.

Our only option was to pour all our cares onto Raine's shoulders alone. She could move quick and light, darting through the corridors, then return to tell of whatever she found. Depending on the result, we could retrace her footsteps when dawn arrived, when the corridors were less dangerous, less filled with unseen monsters.

Raine carried nothing but her knife, barefoot for stealth and speed.

Last thing before she went, Raine shared a private word with Lozzie; I couldn't hear what they said, whispering together at the end of the row of lockers, though I imagined it had something to do with my safety. Raine had not entirely trusted her before, always interposing herself between us. But things had changed over the course of this day, had they not?

Raine slipped a hand around the back of Lozzie's neck and brought their foreheads together, flesh touching flesh, skulls beneath skin. Whispered words passed between them, brown eyes locked on blue. Lozzie smirked. Raine smiled back with a sharp edge to her lips.

They parted a moment later. Raine turned back toward me and Evee and the Fox; she saluted us with the naked blade of her machete, then slipped away, out of sight, heading for the single door of the locker room.

She was so light on her feet that I barely even heard the door open and close.

But somehow, down in my guts, I knew she was gone.

And then we were three — or four, if one included the Saye Fox, dozing once again on the wooden bench. Five if one counted the Praem Plushie in Evelyn's lap. Of that, I was not sure.

Lozzie flounced and fluttered back down the row of lockers, pastel poncho dyed dark in the dead-eyed moonlight pouring through the high, narrow window. Her shiv was nowhere to be seen, her pale little hands empty of sharp objects and mostly clean of blood.

Evelyn spoke up from behind me: "Alright. Alright, you two, we are now alone and vulnerable. That means low voices, keep noise to a minimum, and listen for the sounds of anything moving out there in the corridors. And Heather, for pity's sake, sit down."

But neither Lozzie or I answered. We had eyes only for each other.

Lozzie paused just beyond arm's reach. A playful smile bounced onto her lips, blue eyes dancing in the moonlit shadows. She opened her arms with a wide flourish, poncho fluttering outward like the softly furred membranes of a flying squirrel.

"Hug?" she chirped. "Heathy-huggies? Proper huggie-wugs? For Lozzer's lozziers?"

I hesitated.

My earlier fear of Lozzie had curdled — separated into two distinct impressions. On one hand, this was still the girl whom I had caught earlier that day watching videos of torture and maiming, revelling in cruelty and suffering, which had turned my stomach and brought a cold sweat to my skin. Instinctive caution still held me tight. My body whispered that this was a predator, that I should run from her, without looking back.

On the other hand, the more time Lozzie spent with me and Raine and Evelyn, the more she seemed like her usual self, at least in outward behaviour, speech patterns, and the way she expressed herself.

But the fear remained. No matter how awake our Lozzie seemed, the dreamer dreamed on.

Had this always been a part of her? Had this aspect of Lozzie simply gone unnoticed because I hadn't wanted to see it before?

So, I hesitated — but only for a moment.

"Hug," I said with a nod, then stepped forward with a jerking limp, and opened my arms for Lozzie.

She drew me into a wriggly, giggly, enclosing hug, wrapping her pastel poncho around my back, mixing the fabrics of our protective colourations — her blue-pink-white rustling against my soft yellow blanket. She held on for a little while, rubbing her hands up and down my back, and did not slip a shiv between my ribs. When we parted, she bobbed her head in wordless gratitude.

I let out a breath that I hadn't known I'd been holding. My trust was well-placed, the risk rewarded.

Evelyn cleared her throat. "Are both of you going to continue ignoring me, or have I turned invisible?"

I turned back to Evelyn, cheeks flushed with sudden guilt. Eevee was frowning at the pair of us, one hand on the Praem Doll in her lap. The Doll was staring at us too, with those blank, flat, disc-shaped eyes of stitched fabric.

“Sorry, Eevee-weeve!” Lozzie chirped, peering past me. “Had to get emergency hugs!”

Evelyn sighed and rolled her eyes, but she contained the worst of her ire; Lozzie was hard to stay angry at. “Yes, I’m sure you did. What were you and Raine whispering about, anyway? What was all that?”

Lozzie put a finger to her lips and tilted her head sideways, as if deciding what to say.

“Um,” I butted in quickly. “Lozzie, you don’t have to explain if you don’t want to. It’s okay, it’s—”

“I’m dangerous!” Lozzie chirped. “Danger girl!”

I swallowed a wince.

Evelyn said nothing, waiting for more. When it became evident that Lozzie wasn’t going to explain, Eevee said: “Yes? Yes. You’ve always been dangerous, Lozzie. What are you talking about?”

Lozzie beamed at Eevee. “Nothing!” She flapped her arms wide again. “Eevee want hugs too?”

Evelyn cleared her throat, suddenly uncomfortable. “You know that’s hard for me. Even normally it’s hard. Like this, in this parody of a body? I feel as if a stiff breeze is going to snap me in two.”

Lozzie pointed at the plushie in Eevee’s lap. “Praem can transmit!”

Evelyn squinted at her. “What?”

“Give Praem! Hug transmission! Hug transportation!” Lozzie held out both her hands. “I’ll be gentle, promise promise!”

Evelyn didn’t quite seem to comprehend, and I was a bit lost as well, but after a moment’s hesitation she handed over the Praem Plushie. Lozzie accepted the soft toy with exaggerated reverence, then squeezed the tiny Praem against her chest, engulfing the Plushie in a hug, emitting a high-pitched ‘eeeeee!’ as she did so. Then Lozzie returned the Praem Plushie to Evelyn’s lap.

Evee didn't seem to know what to do. For a moment she hesitated, then averted her eyes and pressed the Doll gently against her own abdomen.

"Well, yes," she muttered, points of colour blossoming in her cheeks. "Mm. Indeed. I see now. Thank you, Lozzie. Yes." Evelyn cleared her throat a second time as Lozzie smothered a giggle. Then she turned an unimpressed frown upon me, voice rising back to normal. "Heather, sit down."

"Oh," I said. "I'm fine, I'm just—"

"Sit. Down," Evelyn snapped. Apparently the second-hand hug had stiffened her spine. "Raine was right, you need to rest that leg. You have a bloody great gash on it, and it's still bleeding. Standing there isn't going to help anybody. Sit down."

"I—"

"Raine will be back within the promised time slot," Evelyn ground the words out through clenched teeth; she was wracked with doubt and fear as well, covering it with concern. "Sit down. Rest the leg. Now. Or I'll ... I'll throw Praem at you."

I tutted. "You wouldn't."

Evelyn raised the Praem Plushie in one hand. A blush burned in her cheeks, pale and thin, the most she could muster. "I shall have Praem menace you. Sit down."

I made a show of surrendering, putting up both hands as I sat down on the wooden bench. I stretched out my wounded leg as best I could, trying not to wince. "Okay, okay. I don't want to irritate Praem, after all."

Lozzie joined us too, her pastel poncho pillowing outward across the cold wood. She bumped her knee against mine — against my uninjured leg — and shot me a sneaky little smile.

"Better," Evelyn grunted, returning the plushie to her lap. "Now, we best spend this time wisely." She nodded at the rest of the food Raine had secured for us earlier, much of it still inside the fabric shopping bag. "Eat up until you're both full, we're all going to need our strength. And pass me another sandwich. I feel like I could eat a racehorse, bones and all."

Evelyn had a good point — we had little to do but eat and wait, counting the seconds and minutes until Raine returned, trying not to think about what would happen if she didn't. I munched my way through several bags of crisps and a handful of little chocolate rolls, craving sugar and salt, trying to replenish my energy; what I really wanted was lemons, and lots of them. An entire supermarket bag of citrus fruit would set right everything that was wrong, or at least that was how I felt, though that was not an option. Evelyn ate another sandwich, chewing and swallowing with mechanical concentration, frowning at the failed magic circles she had drawn on some of the nearby lockers. Lozzie inhaled several bread rolls, and tucked one away inside her poncho for later use.

Ten or fifteen minutes passed with no sign or sound of Raine.

Cygnets Hospital was silent beyond the furtive rustling and muted breathing of our locker-lined corner — all except for the arrhythmic tap-tap-tapping on the radiator pipes, audible only when we three held our breath. Sallow moonlight lit a slice of my pajama bottoms, just above the wound on my left leg. The throbbing was slow and steady, hard and relentless. Pain washed upward through my hips with every beat of my heart. For a while the wound had not seemed so bad, but now I realised that had been an illusion. My nerve endings had been numbed by adrenaline, by the brief appearance of the King in Yellow. Now the pain was growing hard to ignore, turning my thoughts to static, absorbing a greater and greater portion of my attention. I felt fragmented and hazy.

We all slipped into an uneasy silence, food mostly finished, whispers trapped behind our lips. Evelyn sighed, eyes watching the moonlight through the window. Lozzie started to hum and swing her legs, but she trailed off after a while; her tune was light, but the echoes returned oppressive and gloomy. The Fox slept on, the only comfortable one among us.

Eventually I realised that Evelyn was staring at me instead of the window. Our eyes met, but she did not look away or speak up.

“... Evee?”

“Mm,” she grunted. “Heather, come here and let me have a look at you, please.”

“Ah? What for?”

Evelyn made an impatient gesture. “Just slide down the bench.

Don't put weight on the leg, don't stand up. Come here."

I did as Evee requested, sliding to the end of the bench until our knees were almost touching. Evelyn leaned forward in the seat of her wheelchair to get a better look at me. One of her hands was coiled around the Praem Plushie in her lap, hugging it tight; those flat, disc-shaped eyes seemed to examine me as well, though with less intensity. The Fox briefly looked up, found nothing of interest, and resumed her nap.

Evee held out her free hand. "Give me your wrist. Either one."

I offered my wrist. "What are we doing?"

Evelyn took my wrist and pressed her thumb over my pulse, pausing to count inside her own head. I could not help but notice how thin and tired her hands were, how pale and shrunken, all skin and bone.

"Normal enough," she grunted. She turned my hand over and examined my fingernails one by one. Then she let go and gestured at my torso. "Show me your flanks, where your tentacles usually are."

"Um ... not that I mind sharing my body with you, but—"

Evelyn tutted, huffed, and rolled her eyes. Lozzie smothered a giggle with her poncho.

"Heather," Evelyn hissed, "I'm not ogling you. I've seen you half-naked plenty of times. If I wanted to leer at your tits, I would probably not choose this as the location in which to do so. I'm not Raine."

A lump formed in my throat; I hadn't wanted to think about this. "I'm not trying to be funny," I said. "I want to know what you're doing."

Evelyn huffed an impatient sigh. "What do you think I'm doing? Everything here is wrong, including our bodies." She gestured with frustration at her withered leg and missing prosthetic. "You're alone in there, correct? Singlet Heather, not seven of you like normal. Which is wrong. You're missing your tentacles, your bioreactor, all of it, which is also wrong. I'm trying to figure out if there's anything else out of place. Now, show me your sides, come on."

My turn to sigh. "Evee, I don't think you're going to discover the secrets of the dream by goosing my flank.”

Evelyn squinted at me. “What happened to ‘I’m not trying to be funny’?”

The lump in my throat grew so large that for a moment I could not speak. I looked away, composure dropping from my face, pain in my eyes. Evelyn must have noticed, because her tone shifted to baffled concern.

“Heather?” she whispered. “What’s wrong now?”

I swallowed hard, unknotting my throat. “Evee, my body is all wrong, yes. You’re correct. More than you know. The ... the ... abyssal dysphoria? The same urge that led me to make my tentacles real in the first place? It’s painful, like this. I’m not quite at the stage where I want to claw off my skin, but I know I will eventually reach that point if I keep thinking about it. I’ve been in momentum all day, moving, moving, moving. No time to think, and ... I need to not think, about that, about this. I ... I feel ... wrong, being looked at so closely, right now.”

“Oh,” Evelyn said. “Um. Mm.”

“Mmhmm.”

Lozzie murmured too. “Heathy ... ”

Evelyn went silent for a long moment. Then she said, “I don’t know if it helps to know this, Heather, but I feel pretty much the same about my body right now.”

I nodded, unable to meet her eyes. “It does. Here.”

Then I lifted my new disgusting brown jumper and my scratchy white institutional pajama top, to show Evelyn my flanks and the base of my ribcage.

Evelyn was a saint; she didn’t react with surprise, or comment on my sudden acquiescence, let alone make a snide remark. She simply leaned forward and looked, clean and clinical, detached but caring, examining my skin without a sound, except a murmur of ‘Okay, other side, if you please’. Evelyn Saye, the mage, treated my body as a problem to be solved. For once, that helped.

When she was done, Evee leaned back. I covered myself again and pulled my yellow blanket tight. Lozzie peered out from behind her hands — I hadn't even realised she'd covered her eyes for me. I could have hugged her again.

Evelyn said nothing.

"Well?" I asked.

Evelyn cleared her throat. "Do you want me to say anything, or not? I can just keep my thoughts to myself, if you prefer."

"I mean, um ... yes, please do tell me."

Evelyn sucked on her teeth. "I saw nothing. No sign of your usual attachment points for the tentacles. No bruising, no damage, nothing at all." She shrugged, narrow shoulders moving below her grey dressing gown. "Nothing useful. My apologies."

"There's no need for apologies, it's okay," I said. "I just ... it feels so wrong. Like most of me is missing."

"Mm. Obscene," Evelyn said, sucking on her teeth, gazing at my face. "Heather, lean forward, look at me, please. No need for undressing this time, nothing like that."

I did as Evelyn asked. She leaned forward too, so our faces were mere inches apart. For a moment I thought she was going to kiss me on the lips; Lozzie evidently shared the same thought, for she emitted a little giggle-gasp and then stopped up her mouth with a corner of her poncho.

But Eevee didn't react to that. Neither did she kiss me, to my slight disappointment.

She just frowned, peering into my eyes. After a minute or two she leaned back again.

"Huh," she grunted.

"H-huh?" I echoed, still poised for the kiss that never came. "Eevee? What does 'huh' mean?"

"Your eyes," she said.

"What about my eyes?" I leaned back too, one hand going to my right cheekbone, just below the orb in question.

"They're ... odd."

I waited for more, feeling almost as denied as when I'd thought she was about to kiss me. “Evee? Don’t be cryptic, please, don’t leave it at that. I think I need to know if my eyes have turned into mushrooms or if there’s something swimming behind my eyeballs. Just tell me. Nothing else is going to surprise me in this place, really.”

Evelyn frowned harder, but not without compassion. “I’m not sure I can put it into words. It’s not the colour or the shape. They’re still your eyes, they’re still you, just ... different, somehow.” She sighed and waved a hand. “Maybe it’s because I’m only talking to one of you, instead of all seven. And it’s always been all of you, in the past, even before we knew it.”

Lozzie chirped in agreement. “Mmhmm! Just a smalllllll piece of Heathies. Not the whole Heathy collective brain group!”

“Mm,” Evelyn grunted. “Perhaps that’s what I’m feeling. Like all we’re seeing is one limb, not the whole of her.”

“Oh!” I lit up. “Like what happened in that dream one time, the one with Mister Squiddy and Lozzie? I considered that too, but this doesn’t feel anything like that.” I flapped my arms. “I mean, what do you see when you look at me? It’s actually me, right? I’m shaped like me.”

“Heather-shaped is Heather-shaped,” Lozzie said.

“Well, mostly,” I sighed. “Other than the missing tentacles.”

Evelyn nodded slowly. “Yes, I just see you, nothing weird. Do you think the other six of you are around here somewhere?”

I sighed. “I don’t know. Six other Heathers would be pretty active if they were free. They must be locked up somewhere. Maybe inside that high-security area. At least, that’s my working assumption for now. If we can break in there—”

A soft click came from the front of the locker room — the door.

A return, or an intruder.

We held our collective breath. Lozzie bounced to her feet, metal shiv sliding into her hand. Evelyn swallowed and clutched the Praem Plushie tighter. The Fox sprang from her nap and sniffed the air, little black nose twitching at some secret scent. I readied myself to grab Evee’s wheelchair, in case this was a repeat of earlier.

The door clicked shut again.

“Ladies!” came a panting whisper. “Your scout returns!”

“Raine!” I almost cheered — quietly.

Raine hurried across the locker room, no longer concealing the sound of her footsteps. I stood to meet her despite the pounding throb in my left leg, eager to know what she had discovered, eager to welcome her back with a hug.

A blood-drenched spectre stepped around the edge of the locker-canyon, into the shaft of moonlight.

I swallowed a yelp, saved from a scream only by the unmistakable shape of Raine’s face beneath the splatters of gore. A toothy white grin ripped a line of clean white amid the bloody mess.

Raine was covered with a liberal helping of fresh blood. The sticky crimson sheen was soaked into her tank-top and her ragged pajama bottoms, matted in her hair, stuck to her exposed skin, smeared on her face, and slathered on the naked blade of her machete.

Evelyn sighed, rather unimpressed, as if she’d expected this. Lozzie murmured, “Woooow!”

“Raine!” I blurted out. “Are you alright?! Did you get hurt? Did you —”

Raine shot me a wink. “You should see the other guy, sweet thing. And hey, don’t worry, none of this is mine. Haha— ah, ow.” She winced and tensed up around her stomach.

“Raine!”

I rushed to her side, but she waved me off with her free hand. “It’s okay, Heather. Seriously. None of this is mine, not even a graze or a nosebleed. Just a couple of bruises. Don’t get yourself all smeared with this. Stay off for a sec, okay?”

“Raine, we’re in a dream,” I snapped. “I don’t have to worry about bloodborne diseases. Swear to me that you’re alright!”

“I swear it, none of it’s mine.” Raine straightened back up and shook her head. “And it’s cool, I’m gonna rinse off in one of those showers in a sec. No sense muddying us both.”

Evelyn snapped: “Did you leave a trail? Raine, did you leave a trail of blood on your way back?”

Raine shook her head. I realised she was still panting with effort, doing her best to hide it in the cadence of her words. “Nah. Wiped off the worst on a wall. Feet too. No footprints, no trail, no evidence. Except the corpse I left, didn’t have time to move that.”

“Alright, good,” Evelyn said. “Well done. Go get rinsed off if you need to. You absolute fucking mad woman.”

“In a sec,” Raine answered with a smirk. “Hey, sweet thing, Heather. Sling me one of those chocolate rolls from the bag, will you?”

“Of course!”

I grabbed a snack for Raine, unwrapped the packaging, then pressed the packaged end into her free hand so she didn’t smear blood all over her own food. She inhaled the snack in three quick bites.

“Good girl,” I murmured. “Good girl. Well done. Well done for coming back to us. Well done. Oh my gosh, but that is a lot of blood.”

“I found our mysterious tapper,” she said.

Evelyn tutted. “Debrief can wait. Get clean.”

“Uh-uh,” Raine panted. “Gimme a sec. The tapping, it’s not too far from here, in a staff area on the hospital ground floor. All scratchy carpets and cubicles, like an office. Know what I mean?” She didn’t wait for a reply. “Anyway, the tapping pipes lead through a wall, into a corner office or something like that. But it’s weird, it’s not like anything else we’ve seen in this place.”

“Weird how?” I asked.

“Steel door. Steel and glass. Chrome frame. Like some shit from a Silicon Valley techbro office. Not real security, all style, no substance. But I couldn’t get the thing open, it’s locked up tight, can’t jimmy it or anything. Dream logic, I guess. But get this — it’s locked with a keypad. But not like a normal keypad. It’s got dozens of buttons, things that aren’t even numbers on there. I played with it for a bit, but no dice.”

“Mathematics!” I said, eyes going wide. “Brain-math! Eevee, do you think—”

“Mhmm,” Evelyn grunted. “We can’t be certain, but it could be an abstract representation of self-implementing hyperdimensional mathematics. Maybe. Good thinking, Heather.”

“I can get in there!” I said. “I can probably solve it!”

Raine grinned and held up a hand. “Slow your roll. We ain’t doing it right now. It’s not good out there. Nurses are gonna be swarming all over the place after I passed through.”

“Ah, indeed,” Evelyn drawled. “Is that why you look like an extra from an interactive Halloween show?”

“Yes,” I added, clearing my throat with very careful politeness. “That is ... well, I think it might be the most blood I’ve ever seen you covered with, certainly. Other than your own.”

Raine raised her eyebrows at me. “Other than my own?”

“Oh, you got shot in the leg once,” I explained. “Long story. Maybe later.”

Evelyn sighed. “Yes, Raine, what happened?”

Raine lost her smug sheen. She blew out a slow sigh. “Ran into a nurse on the way back. Or, what I think was a nurse, probably. Couldn’t get away clean, not without a fight. She was gonna raise the alarm, then I would have been up against a dozen of the things, up shit creek with no paddle. Had to go hard and fast.” She gestured with her machete. “This is lot worse than it looks, it was over pretty quick.”

“What ... ” My stomach went sour. “What do you mean, you ‘think’ it was a nurse?”

Raine gave me a dark look. “Shit is weird out there at night. Like all the masks are off. I don’t even really know what I saw, just that it bled.”

“Good,” Evelyn grunted. “Things that can bleed are also things that can die.”

“Bleeding and dying!” Lizzie did a little cheer, waving the hem of her poncho. “Woohoo!”

We decided to wait for dawn. Despite her outward bluster and bravado, Raine was clearly exhausted from the fight with the mysterious ‘night nurse’. I suspected the confrontation had been a much more serious battle than Raine was letting on, despite her easy victory. Perhaps she was trying her best to shelter Evelyn and me from our worries; after all, we had almost come face-to-face with one of those nocturnal nurses a little while earlier. The last thing we needed was growing paranoia about monsters stalking just beyond the locker room door.

Raine needed food and rest. My left leg needed time to heal, as much time as we could buy. Evelyn probably needed sleep, no matter what she said. Lozzie wanted to be off soon, off into the dark to assist the ringleaders of her riot; I had the distinct impression that she was planning a series of daring breakouts. But the sight of Raine covered in blood and panting with effort put a pause on Lozzie's plans for now. She agreed to stay with us for the night, even if she must depart come morning. The Saye Fox did not seem eager to leave either, sticking as close to Evelyn as she could.

To my surprise, Raine decided that it was safe to take a shower, in one of the locker room's dingy little cubicles; she posted Lozzie as a lookout at the locker room door, to alert us to the approach of any wandering midnight staff. Raine washed her machete and dried it carefully on a towel, taking better care of the blade than she often did of her own safety. Then she stripped, which was much to my lingering delight, even if I couldn't act on it at that moment; despite the shock of seeing her covered in blood, the implication of her violence made my belly clench up with excitement, fuelled by a moonlit glimpse of her naked form.

But sexy shower times were not meant to be, not this night, not in this place, not with Evelyn and Lozzie within earshot. Raine was all practical solutions, not showy displays — though she did throw me a wink and a flex, just for the sheer fun of it.

She washed the worst of the blood from her clothes, then dried them on a towel as well, before dipping her naked flesh beneath the stream of water. The whole process took less than ten minutes, though she remained wrapped in a towel for some time, until her clothes were dry. If I'd been involved, it would have stretched out to over an hour, and we could not afford such indulgences.

We needed to remain hidden that night, not thumping against the walls.

We bedded down as Raine had suggested earlier, spreading out and bunching up towels on the floor as best we could, wedged into the narrow gap between the two rows of lockers. The floor was cold, but the towels helped, and the company helped even more. Raine and I assisted Evelyn out of her wheelchair so she could lie down properly; she said the floor would be preferable to the chair, despite any problems with the hard surface. Lozzie snuggled up inside her poncho, a nice extra layer of comfort for her; she ended up cuddled close to Eeve's side, though very gently.

Raine took the first watch, sitting on the bench and munching on spare bread rolls. The Saye Fox curled up too, wedged between Eeve and Lozzie. I lay down next to Eeve and fell asleep before I knew it, with the fingertips of one hand gently touching Eeve's wrist beneath the makeshift blanket.

The night was blissfully uneventful. Raine woke me after several hours and changed the dressing on my shin, cleaning the wound and wrapping it in a fresh section of torn pajama bottoms. I took the next watch while Raine slept, listening to the silence of the Cygnet night. I thought about the implications of this dream for a while, then I examined the blade-less hilt of the sword, given to me by the King in Yellow. I hoped this strange gift would make sense to Sevens.

Lozzie took over last; we had already agreed not to subject Evelyn to a turn on watch. Dream or not, Eeve was in a terrible physical state compared to the rest of us, malnourished and exhausted and worn down to a stub.

When I returned to sleep, I pulled the excess of my yellow blanket over Evelyn. She whimpered in her slumber, turning toward me in the dark. A soft mass fell against my side — I groped around and realised it was the Praem Plushie. Evelyn had been clutching it in her sleep. She murmured again, so I returned Praem to her grip, pressing the plushie to her chest. Evelyn hugged it and settled back down, none the wiser to what I had witnessed.

I only wished that I had all my tentacles, so I might have cushioned her all the better.

I slept away the rest of the night cuddled between Raine and Evelyn. I did not dream within the dream. Sleep here was oblivion, to ease the passage of time.

We rose at the first crack of dawn. Everyone drank water and ate more of our provisions.

Evelyn was, as in reality, not a morning person.

“Fuck me,” she groaned once we got her situated back in her wheelchair. Raine pressed a bread roll into her hand. Evelyn stared at the roll as if it had personally insulted her. “Fuck this. Fuck being awake in this parody of body. Fuck, fuck, fuck—”

“I know the feeling, Evee,” I said. “Fuck this.”

“Ooooooooooh!” went Lizzie. “Heathy’s grown fangs!”

“I hope that’s not literal,” I sighed. I knew what she meant — teasing me about swearing — but I ran my tongue over my teeth regardless, hoping against hope that I had gained some modifications overnight. No such luck. I was still blunt.

“Ah, mm, yes, well.” Evelyn cleared her throat and trailed off, then turned her eyes to the narrow window running along the top of the locker room’s back wall. “Are we sure this is going to work? The night nurses will be gone?”

Beyond the walls of Cygnet Asylum, dawn was breaking — though I had no idea how the light was being produced, without a sun to crest the horizon.

The black wrinkles of the Eye’s underside were lit as if by the blazing orange rays of a cloud-graced sunrise; dark red and burnt umber played across the ridges and pits, warning of a rainy day or cloudy skies to come. Dark orange dawn poured into the locker room through that high window, catching dust motes in the cool air, reflecting off the metal of the lockers, turning the floor into a sea of freezing lava — for the dawn brought no warmth, only chill and cold, as if we had returned somehow to the depths of winter.

Raine drew her machete and nodded, mouth a hard line. “Our best chance is to get mobile before the asylum wakes up around us, before the day staff arrive and start their rounds. Or before the night staff turn back into the day staff, if that’s how it works.” She shrugged. “We’ll make for the door with the keypad, so Heather can try it. There’s a way out into the asylum grounds in that office space I told you about, not more than fifty feet from the door. If something goes wrong, that’s our exit. We head out, find somewhere to hide for the morning, then wait for Twil to show herself. That sound about right, sweet thing? Any objections?”

“None,” I said, though my heart was pounding. “I think we can do this.”

Raine nodded at my leg. “How’s the wound feel this morning?”

I made a show of flexing my calf muscle and putting extra weight on the wound. I winced, not entirely for show. “It hurts. A lot. More than yesterday, actually, but in a different way. It’s stiff and slow. I can put weight on it, though. I can run if we have to. I can do this, Raine.”

She smiled for me. “You can do anything. And don’t you know it.”

Evelyn swallowed. “I have no objections.”

Raine raised an eyebrow and cracked an indulgent smile. “I smell a but, Lady Saye.”

“A butt!” Lozzie chirped, then fell about laughing. The Saye Fox watched her with curious intent.

Evelyn huffed and rolled her eyes. “But — do not leave my wheelchair behind. Do not.”

“Wouldn’t dream of it,” Raine said, then winked. “I gotcha, promise.”

“I would carry you myself if I had to, Evee,” I said. “I’ll handle the wheelchair, I promise.”

Lozzie raised a hand high into the air, like a schoolchild with a pending question, beaming a big smile. Raine indicated her with a gracious wave of one hand. “And Lady Lozzers?”

Lozzie lit up. “Oooh! Lady?”

Raine chuckled. “You like that?”

“Mmhmm!” Lozzie chirped. “Buuuut I’m not coming with you three. I gotta go help my other girlyies!”

“Right,” Raine said. “You can link back up with us whenever. We’ll be out in the grounds.”

Lozzie sketched a loose salute. “Yups!”

I gave Lozzie another hug; Raine watched closely, as if ready to leap, but she did not move to separate us. “Good luck,” I said. “And, Lozzie, don’t get caught. You’re doing so well, so well now. Don’t get caught. Please be careful.”

Lozzie did a big comedy wink at me. “Next time you see me, I’ll have a whole squad of freaks at my back!”

“I do hope so. Good luck. Love you, Lozzie.”

Lozzie left the locker room first; she managed to turn her departure into an unintentional comedy routine. She eased open the single door open and peered out into the shadowy morning corridor with big exaggerated gestures, then tiptoed over the threshold like a cartoon character. When she confirmed the coast was clear, she did a big twirl with her poncho, sending her wispy blonde hair all over the place. She giggled, bowed to the rest of us, then turned and skittered off into the labyrinth of Cygnet Hospital, poncho fluttering out behind her.

“She’ll be alright,” Raine purred. “She’s a hell of a lot more robust than I expected. Our little rabble-rouser.”

I nodded along. “She always comes back. From Outside, I mean. She always, always comes back. This is no different.”

Raine raised a curious eyebrow.

“I’ll explain some other time,” I said. “Or maybe I won’t have to, if your memories return soon.”

Raine winked down at me. “You can tell me the story anyway, sweet thing. Let’s move.”

Stepping through the door and back into the warren of hospital hallways was not as simple as it seemed. Raine went first, naked machete in her fist, holding the door for Evee’s wheelchair. I wheeled Evelyn gently through the doorway. The Saye Fox slipped past us, circled Raine’s ankles, and sat on her haunches, keeping watch. Evelyn clutched the Praem Plushie in her lap. Our fabric carrier bag of supplies hung from one of the wheelchair handles.

But I paused on the threshold. A moment of fear took hold in my guts. An absurd notion flowered open in my mind.

“Heather?” Raine hissed.

Evelyn tried to twist around in her seat, squinting at me. “Heather, what the hell are you doing now?”

We had been safe, this one night, tucked away in an unseen corner.

What if we simply stayed there, the three of us, forever? The Fox was free to come and go if she wished. And Lizzie could come visit whenever she liked. Here we would be safe and hidden from the nurses and doctors, from the gaze of the Eye above, from the logic of the hospital, like rats tucked into the walls. We would live in the dark, but we would live, and I could not bear the thought of having Raine or Evelyn ripped away from me again. If only we stayed put, stayed inside the walls, inside the system, inside—

I cleared my throat.

“To fear the foe, since fear oppreseth strength,
Gives, in your weakness, strength unto your foe,
And so your follies fight against yourself.
Fear, and be slain — so worse can come to fight;
And fight and die is death destroying death,
Where fearing dying pays death servile breath.”

The words flowed from me, pure memory. I took a deep breath, straightened up, and nodded to Raine and Evee. “Sorry,” I said. “I was just afraid for a moment.”

“What the hell was that?!” Evelyn hissed.

“Poetry,” Raine whispered, cracking a delighted grin. “There’s my beautiful girl. Reciting poems by heart.”

“Oh, um, no,” I said. “It’s Shakespeare. Richard II. It’s a good mantra against fear, I always thought. The worst thing about fear is fear itself, and retreating from fear. All that stuff. So, let’s go!”

Raine nodded, winked, and saluted me with her naked machete. Evelyn huffed and clung on tight to both her chair and Praem’s empty vessel. I stepped out of the locker room, abandoning our hidden refuge, forever.

We crept through the dim daybreak light of Cygnet at dawn. Deep orange shafts of illumination crept around the corners and across the floors, spears of light stabbing into the shadows of the hospital, peeling back layers of night-time shade, splashing glowing reflections across the white walls, glittering on the metal doorhandles, gathering like liquid flame upon the skirting boards and windowsills.

Raine ‘took point’, as she liked to call it, though the Fox happily overtook her position to scout ahead, doubling back again and again to let us know it was safe to proceed. I took responsibility for Evelyn's wheelchair, moving as quickly as I could, using the counterweight to help with the pain in my left leg.

We journeyed past sweeping metal stairwells and down single-file back passageways, following the route Raine had traced last night, when she had tracked the mysterious tapping sounds. The pipes of the heating system were silent now, the message ended by the dim light of the ruddy dawn.

The aftermath of the riot was everywhere. We passed makeshift barricades which looked as if they had been smashed aside by battering rams. We discovered discarded weapons — mostly pots and pans from the kitchen, along with broken chair legs, lengths of rope, and even an archaic fireplace poker; a few were stained with blood, but not many, not enough to speak of victory. We spotted shredded straitjackets, broken handcuffs, and a door hanging from its hinges. We stepped over bloody bandages, sooty blast-marks from illegal fireworks, and a single shattered megaphone.

It felt like a city, the morning after the spasms of a revolution struggling to be born.

"They really went for it, damn," Raine whispered. "And this was only the first try. These girls have got some real fire in them, oh yeah. Second time's gonna blow the roof off this place."

"Not while we're in it, I hope," Evelyn grunted.

"What if we do the blowing ourselves?" I asked. Raine smirked at me. Evelyn rolled her eyes. I tutted. "That is not what I meant, and you both know it! Gosh. Tch."

Eventually we reached the site of Raine's solitary fight the previous night — a crossroads of sorts, a junction where two long hospital corridors met in a wide space, with a defibrillator and a first-aid box affixed to one of the walls.

Raine paused and frowned, examining a massive splatter of sticky crimson all over the floor and up one wall. The Saye Fox padded over and sniffed at the drying blood. A corner of orange sunlight crept onto the stain, turning it bright and gleaming, still wet in the weak dawn.

"Is this where you put down a nurse?" Evee whispered.

“Mm,” Raine grunted, peering into each of the corridors, machete at the ready, every muscle pulled taut in case of surprises.

“Um,” I whispered. “Where’s the corpse? Where’s the body?”

Raine murmured: “Maybe it got up and walked away.”

Evelyn tutted. “Don’t even fucking joke about that!”

“My apologies,” Raine murmured, unamused, head on a swivel. “The other nurses probably took it away. There were dozens swarming around in the night.”

Evelyn sighed. “Yes, and where are the rest of them now? We’ve haven’t even heard anything moving about! It’s like this place is dead.”

“Let’s not look a gift horse in the mouth,” I whispered. “Raine? What are we waiting for?”

“For a zombie to shamble out of the shadows,” she whispered back, then winked at me. “Come on, it’s just up here, not far now.”

Raine led us down one final corridor and through a pair of nondescript double doors; she eased one of the doors open, slipping inside slowly, before nodding me and Evelyn through to join her. The Fox went first, darting through the gap.

I pushed Evelyn’s wheelchair through, then followed, blinking at the sudden bright light, fluorescent and harsh.

“Yeah, mind your eyes,” Raine whispered. “It’s a bit of a shock. And stay low, I can’t cover every angle in here.”

We stood on the edge of a large open-plan office — a stereotype straight from any sitcom or movie. Little cubicles were separated by modular plastic walls, furred with blue fuzz to aid in sound dampening. Everything was dark blue or grey or made of plastic pretending to be wood. Each cubicle contained a grey desk and a grey computer and a grey plastic chair with blue upholstery. Some of the computers were powered off, but a few of them were on, their screens in night-time power saving mode or showing screen savers that would be more at home in the 1990s. The floor was carpeted in scratchy blue, so perfect and untouched that it looked as if the room had never been used. The ceiling was all fluorescent light bulbs and foam panels. A clock sounded time with a tick-tick-tick, somewhere behind the endless cubicle walls. Some of the desks sported personal effects — pictures of spouses or children, a paperback book here and there, a few vases of flowers. All the little touches were wrong, however; the people in the pictures were melting blobs of indistinct flesh, the paperback books had titles like ‘Anagrammatic Puzzles For Your Quadruple Amputee Cousin’ and ‘How to Make the Most of Being A Dreaming Dead Thing Beyond the Ken of Your Family’. The flowers in the vases were all dead and withered.

One wall — far away to our collective right — was made of big glass doors and long windows, showing a nasty back area between two buildings, a sort of gravel-floored liminal space covered in abused weeds, where employees might go to smoke a cigarette or two. The real asylum grounds were visible at one end, a hint of rolling hills and verdant lawns.

The sunrise had curdled to a grim grey morning, spreading a thin trickle of rain across the glass.

Raine nodded at the glass doors. “That’s our exit. If we get separated for whatever reason, go that way. As for the weird door, follow me. It’s in the back.”

Raine led us on a winding path through the cubicles, keeping her head ducked low. I followed her lead, trying to stay down and out of sight as I pushed Evelyn’s wheelchair along. Eevee stayed completely silent, hunched in the chair, grinding her teeth. The Fox stayed at Eevee’s side now, sticking close. The office was a maze, and strangely muffled. One nurse on the far side would easily see our heads bobbing over the cubicles, and we might get turned around if we tried to flee, stuck in this tangle of low walls and grey surface.

Eventually we reached the back wall. The cubicles ran out, leaving a long clear passageway formed by the plastic dividers and the white plaster of the wall itself. Raine slipped out and to the right. I followed the last few paces to the mysterious door.

Raine stopped, crouched by the strange portal, peering left and right for any sign of pursuit. “Here,” she whispered. “Keypad is on the right.”

The door was exactly as Raine had described — shiny steel behind a layer of decorative glass, in an ornate frame made of glossy chrome. It looked more like something from a bad science fiction movie than anything I had dreamed up. I wondered who had influenced this.

Twil, perhaps?

A keypad was set into the wall just to the right of the door, sporting the same steel-and-chrome aesthetic. It was huge, with over fifty little metal buttons protruding from the flat surface, topped by a tiny green LCD screen. Some of the buttons were numbers — one through zero, the usual — but most of them showed obscure mathematical symbols, signs I had only ever seen in passing. A few of them were absolutely bizarre, little swirls or spirals, spike-edged crosses, even a tiny picture of a splayed hand.

But that was not the oddest thing about the door.

My eyes were drawn to the little brass plate above the keypad.

Raine followed my wide-eyed gaze, then frowned. “Huh,” she hissed. “That wasn’t there last night. That’s new.”

Words were etched into the plate.

‘Professor Wilson Stout. Mathematics Consultant.’

Evelyn grew in a gasp. “Heather, that’s—”

“Notes Toward a Unified Cosmology,” I murmured. “Yes. Evee, it’s—”

“I know,” Evelyn rasped. “I know.”

“I don’t,” Raine hissed, all business. “Who’s Wilson Stout? Do we know him?”

“Yes!” I hissed. “Well, no, actually. But I know his book. His pamphlet, really, he ... um ... I-I don’t even know where to start, I —”

“Professor Stout was an academic at the University of Sharrowford,” Evelyn hissed quickly. “One of the original Sharrowford Coven which founded the Medieval Metaphysics Department. We — oh fuck this, Raine, you don’t remember any of this. He wrote a pamphlet explaining the theory of self-implementing hyperdimensional mathematics — a pamphlet which I gave to Heather when we first met, to explain to her what was happening to her, to give her something to work with. The professor went missing shortly after writing it, in 1974. Went missing from inside a locked office.” She took an unsteady breath. “I once joked with Heather that maybe he had messed with the maths too much, and met the Eye.” Evelyn swallowed. “Well, egg on my face, hm? Not a joke anymore, is it?”

I could barely comprehend what I was looking at.

The mathematics in Notes Toward a Unified Cosmology had helped save me. Evelyn had handed me that slim volume when I was barely two weeks In The Know, still groping for meaning, for a handhold, for any way to understand what had happened to me. She had gifted me the blessing of a sliver of insight, in that dingy, sad little room beneath Sharrowford University Library. That book and the hints it had contained had opened the way for me. I owed the real support to Raine and Evelyn, of course, to my friends and allies. But without the words in that book — without the mathematical notation, the foundation through which to understand brain-math — I was not certain I would ever have found all the tools to mount this rescue operation for my sister.

The notion of another person who had journeyed beyond and returned was not so shocking anymore, not since I had met Taika.

But Maisie had been out here, in the clutches of the Eye, for about ten years.

Professor Wilson Stout had vanished from a locked office in 1974. He had been Outside — or in the abyss, or right here in Wonderland — for four and a half decades.

What manner of creature had been calling for help by tapping on those pipes?

Who — or what — was behind this door?

“Heather,” Eevee hissed. “Heather, we don’t know what’s in there.”

“He could be an ally,” I whispered back. “He was calling for help! Eevee, I’m not leaving anybody behind here. Nobody! Nobody gets left with the Eye!”

Evelyn clenched her jaw. Raine was poised, ready to move at a moment’s notice, eyes watching and ears listening for any sign that we were not alone. The Saye Fox waited on her haunches, still and alert in the way only an animal can be.

“Nobody gets left behind, Eevee,” I whispered. “Not even an elderly mathematics professor.”

Evelyn swallowed. “Fine. Fuck it, I guess you wouldn’t be Heather if you didn't say something like that. Alright. Try the keypad. Raine, be ready, this might be nasty. Let's see if the Professor is accepting office hours walk-ins."

bedlam boundary – 24.14

Pale and pallid fluorescent light leaked from buzzing, flickering fixtures on the ceiling of the office-labyrinth, leeching the life from the scratchy blue carpet, bleaching the cubicle dividers to a bloodless grey, turning the white plaster of the wall into mist-wreathed bone; dull arcs of stained illumination reflected from the chrome housing of the keypad, trembling and twitching beneath the shadows of my stalled hands.

The longer I hesitated, crouched on the floor before the glass-and-metal door and its attendant keypad of mathematical symbols, the more alien and wrong this sheltered cove became, like an illusion wavering into solidity in my peripheral vision.

I blinked away the gathering sweat in my eyes, tried to wet my lips with a dry and raspy tongue, and forced a swallow down my empty throat.

Tiny raindrops pattered on the windows far to the right, casting the dreamlike office vault deep into a static haze. My breath came in nervous gulps. Sweat beaded in my hairline. The day-old wound on my left shin throbbed with every drum-like heartbeat. My yellow blanket felt thin and threadbare across my shivering shoulders. We were on a time limit; a nurse or an office worker or some other unknown staff member might interrupt us at any second. Three pairs of eyes — Raine, Evelyn, and the Saye Fox — watched me expectantly, waiting for me to open the barred portal to the office of Professor Wilson Stout.

Seconds ticked by, but I made no moves.

Eventually Raine hissed my name. “Heather? Heather, what’s wrong?”

I swallowed a sigh and lowered my hands. I hadn’t even touched the ridiculous fifty-button keypad, not even to punch keys at random. I must have looked totally gormless, staring at the thing for over a minute, eyes wide and mouth hanging open like a cave-woman examining an internal combustion engine.

“I’m sorry,” I whispered. “It turns out I have no idea what I’m looking at. Um. Oops, I suppose?”

“What!?” Evelyn snapped.

Raine gently tapped on the arm of Evee’s wheelchair. “Shhhh. Voice low, magic lady. I can’t see over these cubicle dividers, and they absorb all the small noises. Somebody walks in here and we might not know until they’re right on top of us.”

Evelyn tutted and rolled her eyes, but she dropped her voice to a whisper. “Heather, what do you mean, you have no idea what you’re looking at? You’re the one who insisted we open the bloody door!”

I tore my eyes away from the numbers and symbols and magical sigils on the keypad. My chest burned inside with shame and awkward guilt.

Raine was crouched at my side, directly in front of the glass-and-chrome door; she was poised to spring forward or leap back as soon as the door swished open — as I imagined it would, like an automatic door in a silly science fiction television show, complete with a swoosh sound and a little ding. She clutched her naked machete in one fist, one ear cocked toward the ceiling, listening for any feet which might approach through the maze-like tangle of office cubicles. The Saye Fox waited at her heels, facing the opposite way, doing her best to watch our backs. Evelyn was sat in her wheelchair, clutching the Praem Plushie to her abdomen, scowling at me with incredulous incomprehension. We were hemmed in behind by the modular wall of cubicle dividers, but open on our flanks by the narrow corridor between the dividers and the real wall. We were hidden in the back of the office room, yet equally exposed. All it took was one person around a corner and we’d be fleeing for our freedom and our lives.

“I’m sorry!” I hissed. “I assumed the symbols would make sense to me, subconsciously, or instinctively, like brain-math always does, but they’re just ... meaningless.” I shrugged, feeling helpless. “They must be an abstract representation of brain-math, but I don’t have any brain-math in my head right now. I don’t have anything. I’m sorry, Evee.”

Raine whispered: “It’s alright, sweet thing. If we can’t do it, we can’t do it. We move on. Ready to go?”

Evelyn clenched her teeth and hissed, “Heather, for fuck’s sake. Just press the buttons at random! Follow your heart!”

I winced, the shame growing sharper. “Evee, this isn’t one of your magical girl animes. It’s brain-math, it—”

“Then follow your liver, or your bowels! Or do an eeny meeny miny moe! Roll a dice!”

“But—”

“This is a dream and a story, Heather, for pity’s sake! Press the buttons!” Evee jabbed her free hand toward the keypad. “Get on with it before something blunders in here!”

“But you said—”

Evelyn’s eyes blazed at me. “Heather, you are the only one of us fully awake and partially in charge of this narrative. Press. The. Buttons.”

I bit my lower lip, nodded, and turned back to the keypad.

Lacking my tentacles and my bioreactor was an offense to the body and soul, like being crammed back into a form that I had surpassed a dozen times over; the dysphoria was a creeping sensation of physical wrongness, spreading over my skin like cold tar every time I dared approach the mere thought, every time I felt the absence of my other six limbs, my other six selves, and the pumping, glugging, glowing bio-mechanical engine which should have been nestled deep in my guts.

But the absence of brain-math was a far stranger sensation. All my knowledge of hyperdimensional mathematics had always been an imposition, an intrusion, even a violation. Brain-math was pressed into me from outside — from Outside, by the Eye, a form of nightly torture I had never wanted and never asked for. Even with all seven of me working in concert to pull the dripping levers of reality, brain-math still hurt. If I was placed in some kind of metaphysical dilemma and forced to choose between the knowledge and the biology, I would choose the biology every time. I did not need the knowledge or the power, only that which had resulted from them.

But now, staring at a cluster of meaningless buttons, I felt a lack I had never realised before. Like losing a limb I hadn’t known I possessed.

Part of me was empty of information, as if I had forgotten how to walk.

Half in shame and despair, half to satisfy Evelyn's hunch, I jabbed buttons at random — some numbers, a few mathematical symbols, a string of the weird esoteric signs. I mixed them up and followed pure chance.

The little LCD screen at the top of the keypad filled with a row of black Xs, then went blank again, waiting for the next attempted input.

The door stayed shut.

"Tch," Evelyn tutted. "Try again!"

"My darling lady Saye," Raine purred. "You were so against this a moment ago. Why the change of heart?"

"Heather convinced me. And she needs to see it through, her decisions in this place have been vindicated so far. Heather, try again! Keep going!"

I choked down a cold slug of self-disgust. This was almost as bad as being forced to strip naked in front of Evelyn without my tentacles, so she could peer at what was missing. I felt stunted, cut off at the knees. I began to understand what Evelyn felt like, confined to that wheelchair, unable to do something which had seemed so simple all my life.

"Evee," I hissed, looking away from the keypad again. "I don't even ... know ... what ... "

I trailed off, blinking at our forgotten fifth companion.

"Heather?" Evelyn whispered. "What? What is it now?"

The Praem Plushie was staring at me — but no, that was impossible. Those blank eyes were made of fabric and stitches, they couldn't move. She was constructed of cloth of stuffing, no matter how delicate and detailed her little maid dress seemed. Even if she meant something more within this dream, she could not move, let alone look at me.

But still, she stared.

"Evee," I said slowly. "May I please borrow Praem for a moment?"

Evelyn's eyebrows drew together in a craggy frown. Perhaps subconsciously, her grip tightened on the plush toy. "What?! Why?"

"Evee, I promise you, I love Praem almost as much as you do. I won't go anywhere with her and I'm certainly not going to hurt her. I just think ... well, it's going to sound crazy, which I'm painfully used to by this point in my life, thank you very much, but I would like her help with this." I lowered my eyes back to the Praem Plushie. "Will you lend me your aid, Praem?"

The Plushie did not answer, for her mouth was a short, straight line of narrow black fabric.

Evelyn frowned at me like I was mad — which was fair, because in reality such a request would have been the height of insanity. But Evee also trusted me, with both her life and her heart.

She held out the Praem Plushie. "Don't you dare drop her! This floor is probably filthy. Offices are always unhygienic."

"I would not dream of treating her with anything but the utmost care," I said, and accepted Praem with both hands.

The Plushie weighed very little, just felt and fuzz. I held her upright, as if I was cradling a tiny person, supporting her underside with one hand. Then I faced her toward the keypad, held one of her blunt little arms in my other hand, and used Praem to press the buttons.

I didn't think, I just went with whatever felt right, guided by the plush fabric in my hands. Praem's stubby little arm needed additional pressure from my fingertips to help click the glossy metal buttons. I held my breath as the LCD screen filled with numbers and symbols. Evelyn looked on with a scrunch-eyed frown. Raine stayed perfectly tense, ready to move. The Saye Fox did not bother to watch.

The symbols completed an equation, then flashed into a line of little check-marks.

Before I could lower Praem or let out a sigh of relief, the glass-and-chrome door opened with a soft swish-swish and little mechanical 'bing!' Exactly as I had expected.

The halves of the shiny metal door parted and slid aside, retracting into the frame.

Beneath them lay another door.

I almost sighed and rolled my eyes in exasperation. The dream was mocking us, playing stupid games.

A regular old wooden door, made of stout, thick, dark wood, stained with age and cigarette smoke. A little metal handle stood at one side, above a keyhole. The door was set in an oddly familiar frame. I frowned with buried recognition, but I couldn't quite put my finger on what I was looking at.

Evelyn said it just before I realised. "That's the door to the Medieval Metaphysics room," she hissed. "Fuck me."

"Not here," Raine whispered back, totally deadpan. "Floor's too scratchy."

"Oh, shut up!" Evelyn hissed. "I cannot believe that worked. Here, Heather, give Praem back to me, please."

I held up the Praem Plushie briefly, facing me, and said, "Thank you for your assistance, Praem." Then I pressed her back into Evelyn's lap. Eevee tucked an arm around Praem's middle, securing her back in place.

"Well," I said. "Maids can go anywhere."

Evelyn squinted at me. "What?"

"Just something Praem said to me once, that's all."

"Shhhhhh," Raine hushed us. She reached up and tried the handle of this second, covert door. The door parted from the frame. Unlocked. "Both of you be ready. We might have to run. Heather, grab Eevee's wheelchair. Eevee, hold on tight."

"R-right!"

Evelyn tutted. "Yes, thank you for the reminder. As if I didn't know."

I scrambled back over to Evelyn and took hold of the handles on her chair. The Saye Fox nosed up to the door, as if suddenly curious. Raine eased the door away from the frame until she could peer through the gap with one eye, then flung it wide and scrambled over the threshold.

"Clear!" she hissed a moment later. "Get in here!"

I followed, pushing Evelyn's wheelchair ahead of myself, trying not to hobble on my aching left leg. The Saye Fox darted past us, plunging inside. As soon as I got Evelyn through the door and safely into the room beyond, Raine slipped the door shut behind us, sheltering us from the maze of office cubicles.

"Oh," I said, straightening up at last, back and thighs aching after our crouched scurry through the offices. I took in the room, wide-eyed. "This is ... different. Not what I expected."

"Familiar enough," Evelyn grunted. She was trying to play down the sense of creeping wrongness. A rough swallow betrayed her bravado.

"We know this place?" Raine asked. She wrinkled her nose.

"We do," Evelyn said. "Though not like this."

"Very well, in fact," I added. "Like a home away from home."

"Though I suppose we haven't been here in a while," said Evelyn. "And this isn't real. Right. Have to keep that in mind. None of this is real. Just a nightmare, a play. Yes. Right."

We were standing in the Medieval Metaphysics room, as it must have looked long before any of us had been born.

Bookcases lined the walls to our left and right, towering sentinels of dark and glossy wood, their shelves unbowed by time and weight, though I recognised their shape and colour and feel from their real-life counterparts, aged and worn as they were by an additional forty five years. They sported a very different catalogue in this dream-wrought memory, not a single occult tome or witchy volume in sight. Mathematics textbooks and papers lined the shelves from floor to ceiling, organised by some system my literary experience could not unpick at a mere glance. One side of the room boasted a low sofa — in awful tacky orange, a wisely abandoned relic of the 1960s — around which gathered many piles of additional books, most of them stuffed with bookmarks, some of them dog-eared or propped open in careless abuse of their fragile spines. A sleeping bag was unrolled on the sofa, topped with a rather unclean looking pillow, surrounded by used tissues, dirty eating utensils, and a discarded toothbrush in a filthy glass.

The back of the room was dominated by a large, archaic wooden desk, exactly the kind I would expect to see in the office of a mid-century academic. More books littered the desktop, mostly serving as paperweights for loose sheets covered in handwritten mathematical notation. A few mugs held pens and pencils and other such stationery, while others held the mouldy remnants of forgotten coffee and ancient tea stains. A plate with a half-eaten meal of chicken pie stood on one corner of the desk, stone cold and congealed. Empty alcohol bottles lined the floor to the left of the desk — mostly whisky and vodka, all dry.

A large leather chair stood behind the desk, lined and cracked with age. Three comfortable armchairs formed a little semi-circle in front, a welcoming place for students and visitors to sit.

The back wall was broken by a line of windows, exactly as with the real Medieval Metaphysics room. The windows showed a fog-shrouded view of Sharrowford University, all spires and concrete rooftops and the looming giant of the library, spread out many floors below us, as if we had suddenly ascended to the tip of the building. All the structures were hazy in the mist, half-seen and blurred, as if in a dream.

Below that window stood an iron radiator, painted with peeling white.

Despite the defamiliarisation of such a beloved refuge, seeing the Medieval Metaphysics room in the guise of a slightly archaic academic office was not the source of our shared discomfort.

The air was hot and humid, reeking of meat, as if the heat was turned up all the way and something had died inside the wall cavity. A low rumble seemed to come and go, just below the level of human hearing, a slow and steady rasp with long pauses between strokes. Every surface looked somehow rubbery, but only when seen in one's peripheral vision.

"So," Raine said eventually.

"Yes," I replied.

"This room."

"Yes."

"It feels like we're standing inside something's mouth."

"Yes."

Evelyn whispered: "Fucking hell. You think that tapping was a trap?"

"Not sure," Raine answered. She held her machete low and loose, one hand still on the door. "Doubt it. Wouldn't it have sprung already? And where's the Professor?"

"Maybe ... maybe he goes home during the day?" I ventured.

Evelyn snorted. "Maybe this is the Professor."

"Heather," Raine said, soft and unsmiling. "Your call. You're in charge. Do we investigate or go back?"

"I ... I can't ... um ... "

Before I could make a decision, the Saye Fox padded forward on her silent paws. She trotted right down the middle of the room, without a care, and started sniffing at the sofa, the little piles of books, then on to the desk, winding her way around the wooden legs. She seemed completely unafraid.

Raine and Evee and I shared a series of uncomfortable glances. But when reality failed to snap shut around our vulpine friend, Raine nodded, and said, "Alright. Let me go first."

"Mm," Evelyn grunted. "I want a look through those windows. Wheel me over there, please. That can't be Sharrowford out there, it's not possible."

We did as suggested, spreading out and investigating Professor Stout's office, the room that would one day become the last remnant of the Medieval Metaphysics Department. Raine went first, true to her word, making a quick circuit of the space and peeking under the desk, machete held at the ready, in case anything or anybody was lurking in some unseen hidey-hole. But she turned up nothing. The room really was deserted. I pushed Evelyn toward the back window, taking it slowly, trying to breathe through my mouth to block out the foul, meaty smell in the air; I examined the titles of the books, making sure they didn't spell out some secret message or code. But they were perfectly mundane. Unlike the worrying titles of the novels back in the main office, the mathematics textbooks looked real enough. We even paused briefly to remove one from the shelf and flick it open. The cover did not feel like warm flesh or rotting meat. Inside, the book was legitimate, nothing spooky, nothing untoward.

"Maybe they're his," I suggested. "Maybe that's what he's been clinging to this whole time. Mathematics."

"I'd prefer to cling to a pair of tits," Raine said, without smiling. "But hey, whatever's kept him sane."

Evee and I passed the desk; I glanced at the papers with the mathematical equations, but I couldn't make head nor tail of them.

When we reached the windows, I just stared at Sharrowford, trapped behind the glass. I went up on tiptoes, trying to peer down at the ground, but the fog outdoors was too thick, and seemed to be clouding the perspective. I could make out little except the outlines of the buildings, standing like silent towers in the murk. Up close, the fog seemed greasy and dark, like fetid breath.

Evelyn leaned forward, scratched at the corner of one window, and peeled away the paper.

The illusion was broken instantly — the 'windows' were just a paper background over a sheet of moist plywood. The vista of Sharrowford University was fake.

My head swam with a strange reverse vertigo. Sweat prickled beneath my yellow blanket, and I had to flap the sides for some fresh air. Raine joined us quickly and put a steadying hand on my shoulder. "Heather?"

"It wasn't real," Evelyn muttered, lifting the sheet of paper. "Just a fake. A print out or something. To remind him of home? Ugh, this plywood smells like dog food."

"But it looked so real!" I protested, peering at the paper covering from different angles. The illusion moved with my perspective. "Oh, that is too much for me. That is very weird. I hate it, thank you."

"So do I," Raine muttered. Sweat was beading on her exposed arms and shoulders, drawn out by the humid heat. "There's nothing here for us, unless the maths on the desk makes any sense. This place is wrong. Feels like something sleeping. Let's get out of here."

"Agreed," Evelyn said. "I am not above admitting that this room is giving me the creeps. Heather, you—"

A voice suddenly spoke, from right behind us.

"Two and two and two and seven. Seven sevens. That all makes one. No ... no, that's not correct. Damn. Damn it all."

We scrambled back, away from the windows. Raine's machete came up. I pulled Evelyn away, toward the bookshelves.

But the source of the voice did not look up, nor pay us the slightest bit of attention.

A man was sitting in the leather chair behind the desk, as if he'd been there all along.

Tall and thick, solidly built, with muscle beginning to run to fat, like an ageing rugby player. Dark hair and a matching beard had gone ragged, much in need of a trim and a cut, both speckled with too much grey for his apparent age; the man looked to be in his forties or early fifties, but prematurely withered and worn by stress and strain. A large nose was flanked by sunken green eyes, deep in pools of dark-ringed skin and sagging bags, their whites shot through with bloody veins, turned pink with sleepless effort. He wore an almost stereotypical outfit — smart trousers, a simple button-up shirt, and a tweed jacket with leather patches on the elbows. His tie was loose, pulled away from an open collar. His clothes were rumpled and greasy, as if he'd slept in them for months; a ripe smell rose from him — human body odour mixed with carnivore breath and wet dog. He was hunched over the notes and equations on the desk, his forehead resting in one meaty hand, staring at the numbers as if they were a diagnosis of terminal cancer. His other hand held a pair of large wire-frame glasses, limp and forgotten, as if he was about to drop them.

He didn't acknowledge us at all.

Raine had leapt to the opposite side of the room. I shared a glance with her and she nodded me sideways. Evelyn swallowed, gripping the armrests of her wheelchair. Slowly we all edged around to the front of the desk, so the semi-circle of three chairs were safely between us and the sudden new appearance.

Raine squeezed my arm, perhaps to reassure both of us. She whispered: "Is this him?"

"Probably!" I hissed back.

"Wait," Evelyn said. "Where's the— ah!"

She pointed.

The Saye Fox was perched in one of the chairs meant for students and visitors, directly across from the man at the desk. She was sitting on her haunches, watching his sad, drawn, exhausted face with her amber eyes. Her bushy tail was swishing back and forth.

“She knows what she’s doing,” Raine whispered. “She’s safe. Not led us astray yet.”

Evelyn clenched her teeth, but said nothing.

“Should we ... ?” I let the question hang.

“You want me to call out to him?” said Raine.

I shook my head. “I’d rather do it myself. I suppose I am a fan of his book, technically. Maybe that’ll help. Um, be ready though, I suppose?”

Raine nodded and raised her machete, ready to move. I winced at the implication of impending violence, but put it from my mind for now. We truly had no idea what we were looking at, not really. If this was the real Wilson Stout, then he’d been Outside — or trapped within the Eye — for almost half a century.

“Excuse me?” I said, purging the tremor from my voice. “Professor Stout?”

His eyes continued tracking back and forth across the equations. He placed his glasses down and reached for a pencil; something about the motion of his arm made my stomach turn over, like his limb was moving at the wrong angle.

“Wilson Stout?” I said. “You were calling for help? Professor? Professor!”

“Mm,” he grunted, but still did not look up. He frowned harder, as if the numbers were torture. He drew the pencil back toward the page, then hesitated, lead tip trembling above the paper.

Evelyn whispered, “What the hell is wrong with his arm?”

“Like it’s broken,” Raine murmured. “Weird.”

“Professor,” I repeated. “Didn’t you need help?”

“My apologies, young lady,” he muttered, his voice a deep and broken baritone, like cracked granite. “But I’m not seeing students at current. My office hours are cancelled. It seems I must throw myself upon the mercies of the so-called ‘private sector’. Barbarians and philistines. If only I could ... ” He moved to write something with the pencil at last, then stopped and winced before he could commit to the page. He rubbed at his forehead, as if trying to smooth out the furrows. The motion of his hand was wrong as well, like meat rubbing on meat.

“Oi!” Raine said. “Wilson. Eyes up.”

He shook his head, eyes scrunched hard, still staring at the page, almost on the verge of tears; his head moved on his neck like rubber. “I can’t, I can’t, I’m simply out of time. I’ve been out of time for so long, these moments are too precious to—”

“Yip!” went the Saye Fox.

Wilson Stout looked up.

I recoiled. Evelyn flinched in her wheelchair. Raine, to her credit, held her ground with only a tightness of her muscles.

Wilson Stout had been pretty believable when he was hunched over his work; but when he sat up, his body moved like a single boneless mass, meaty and floppy.

He was a tongue, attached to the root of the mouth in which we stood.

He squinted at his vulpine visitor, then scrambled for his glasses and fumbled them onto his face; the motion of his arms was stomach-churning, no elbows or wrists, just flapping, muscular meat. He blinked several times, widening his eyes as if he couldn’t believe what he was seeing. His expression hesitated, then twitched with a fragile, bruised smile. A spark of forgotten happiness spread to his exhausted eyes. He blinked, and suddenly seemed a little less glassy.

“You know you’re not supposed to be here, Laurissa,” he said to the Fox, softly and gently, as if whispering a familiar flirtatious line to an old flame. “You’re barred from the campus, let alone my office. I’m pretty certain your husband will turn me into something unnatural if he thinks you came here willingly. Your reassurances are going to fall on deaf ears eventually.”

Evelyn raised a hand to her own mouth, stifling a gasp. I peered down and saw she had gone pale and wide-eyed.

“Evee?” I whispered.

She looked up, shaken but rapidly pulling herself together.
“Laurissa!” she hissed. “That was my grandmother’s name!”

“Oh!” I hissed. “Oh my gosh! The handwritten dedication in the front of his pamphlet. It was to her. I remember.”

I’d read that line so many times, every time I’d opened the Notes.
‘To Miss Laurissa Saye, I hope you will find this illuminating.’

Evelyn swallowed. “I ... I suppose I knew it had to be true, who else could the Fox be, but ... ” She trailed off, shaking her head and staring at the Saye Fox — at Laurissa Saye, her own grandmother, somehow — with something akin to awe.

The Fox replied to Wilson with a soft ‘Murr-r-r-rup.’ She clacked her teeth and swished her tail to one side.

The Professor almost laughed, pushing his glasses up his nose with one finger. For just a moment the exhaustion and the care and the weight of terror seemed to lift from his shoulders. He seemed like a young man, too embarrassed to flirt back.

“Not as if I could have stopped you, even if I wanted to,” he said, glancing at the Fox over the rim of his glasses. “You always did have a habit of getting in anywhere you liked, whenever you liked. Always the smartest person in any room. You were wasted on that man. Did you read my book? Ah, who am I kidding, of course you did, you probably just didn’t consider it worth commenting on. A poor little screed, really, with not much to say that you hadn’t already deduced. I would be flattered though, by even a simple acknowledgement. Just tell me you read it?”

Evelyn’s shock turned to a grimace. “Oh. Great.”

Raine whispered: “Are we watching your grandmother flirt with her side-piece?”

Evelyn tutted. “I think so.”

“Ah,” I said, feeling my cheeks grow warm. “Oh. Well. Um.”

Wilson Stout frowned, but not at us. “Wait, no. But how could you have gotten in here, Laurissa? This isn’t ... I mean, this isn’t my ... my real office, my ... ”

The weight of years settled back onto the Professor’s shoulders as he stumbled over his words. His eyes darkened once again with that thousand-yard stare, his gaze drifting downward, toward the mathematics on the desk. The Fox went 'Yip!' but Wilson just shook his head and swallowed, his mind consumed by the equation before him.

"Oh no," I hissed. "We're losing him again."

"Could go shake his shoulder?" Raine suggested. "I'd rather not touch him though."

"Allow me," Evelyn said, then cleared her throat, and spoke with a full measure of steel in her spine, as Evelyn Saye, The Mage of Sharrowford's Occult Underworld. "Then she really is my grandmother? Do I have you to thank for this confirmation, Professor Stout?"

The Professor's head jerked back up, drawn by the ropes of authority, like a gigantic wet tongue flopping free. He blinked at Evelyn a few times, then sat up straighter, squinting through his glasses.

"And who are you, young lady?" he asked.

"Evelyn Saye," said Evee. "Daughter of Loretta Julianna Saye, granddaughter of Laurissa Saye. You knew my grandmother. I believe you may have been closer than I originally thought. Or perhaps I should say you're still close, as she is apparently sitting right there. Forgive me if I am rather curt, because we are in a hurry and this is an emergency. Pay attention, Professor. Concentrate."

Wilson Stout just stared, lips parted, as if having trouble processing Evee's words. "I ... Laurissa's grandchild? And you're grown up. You're an adult. I ... I see. I ... see."

I spoke up. "You've been in here a long time."

Wilson looked at me, eyes sunken pits of exhaustion, so deep and dark that they might run down his face in thick tears of pitch-black tar.

"Mate," Raine said. "You were tapping. Calling for help, right?"

Stout shrugged. He seemed distracted suddenly, glancing at his books on the shelves. "Yes. Well, that's hardly relevant now."

“Why not?” Raine asked. “We’re here. We’re help. What’s wrong with that?”

Stout sighed. “You’re not the right kind of help.”

“Do you know where you are?” I asked. “Where here is?”

“Here?” he echoed, glancing at me.

“Inside the Eye,” I said. “Do you understand that we’re all inside the Eye, right now?”

He squinted, adjusting his glasses. “The what? Pardon, I’m ... I must ... I must get back to the equation. It’s the only way, you see, the only way.”

Raine shook her head. “Poor bastard doesn’t even know where he is. No different to me in my cell.”

“Wait,” Evelyn snapped. “Stout. The equation is the only way to what? What are you trying to achieve?”

Stout blinked several times, focused on Evee, as if struggling to clear his vision. “I know I am trapped in a whirlpool. Going around and around, all of me scattered every which way. Did you know you can map whirlpools with mathematics? Tornadoes, twisters, hurricanes, all the most violent and dangerous meteorological phenomena, you can actually predict every blade of grass they will touch, if you only had enough information.” He touched the notes on the table. “If only I could compile all the information, I could pull myself back together. But there’s very few pieces left. It’s only her presence that is allowing me to remember myself.” He nodded at the Saye Fox. “And this is but a moment of clarity before the madness takes hold again. I have been mad for such a very long time. In fact, I’m uncertain if I still exist at all, independently of external observation. I think I have been replaced by something that was once my echo, but is now simply all this.” He tightened his grip, creasing the notes on the table before him. “My life’s work has supplanted me. My mind is just another line of this unfinished proof.”

“You do know where you are,” I said. “You do! Professor, please look at me.”

“What is the point?” he said, casting his eyes downward. “My work will never amount to anything, never affect a single atom of the world, never achieve escape velocity to—”

“I read your book.”

Professor Stout looked up. He frowned at me, first with disbelief, as if I had tried to wound him with a backhanded insult. But then his expression cleared. He scratched at his beard. “Did you? Did you now?”

“Notes Toward a Unified Cosmology, yes. And it helped me, a lot. Most of it made sense. Not all of it was correct, of course, I doubt any single work ever can be. But it helped me, more than any other book I’ve ever read. I would like to thank you for that, even if you’re not real anymore.”

“Really? Well. Well, that’s wonderful. I’m glad my work could make some difference. I left something behind, then? An anchor in the real world. Mm, yes. A legacy. Good, good, that’s something, that’s something.” His eyes wandered away from us, back to the Fox, then to his desk.

“We’re not going to leave you behind,” I said. “Professor, we can get you out of here, the same as everybody else.”

Raine hissed: “Are we sure about that, Heather?”

I replied in a whisper. “We have to be sure! He’s been here longer than Maisie, and I don’t think there’s much of him left, but he is still here!”

But Professor Stout was already waving down my suggestion of help. “Oh, it’s far too late for that,” he said. “I’ve got a meeting at nine today, then three seminars from ten, on through lunchtime, and an afternoon class to teach. It’s all go go go here.” Suddenly he looked back up and clicked his fingers. “Did you get my memo?”

“Memo?” I echoed. “Sorry?”

Evelyn sighed. “He’s partially in and out of the dream. Keeps forgetting where and what he is.”

“Yes, yes!” Stout said, suddenly animated, almost agitated. “I sent a memo, tucked away with the new contract agreement for the staff. I could get away with that, since I’m properly tenured and all. Not as if the administration can do anything to get rid of me, I’m here for the duration. Haha.” He smiled and chuckled. “That is how you ended up here, yes? You got my memo. You must have gotten it. It contained a serious portion of my work here.” He tapped his notes. “Enough to key in any interested soul.”

Evelyn and Raine and I shared a glance. Raine shrugged. Evelyn frowned. I chewed on my bottom lip.

Stout sighed and grew more annoyed. “It was vital! It contained vital components of local analysis and measurement. You couldn’t have simply walked in here without it, one of you must have read my memo and comprehended it, which— oh.” He stopped and blinked. “Which means one of you is a fellow mathematician, of course. Which of you would it be?” His eyes lowered to the Fox for a moment. “Not you, Laurissa, you were always a genius, but you never could understand the fundamentals of my discipline. You were a good listener, though. Very encouraging.”

“Me,” I said. “I’m the mathematician. Or I was, I suppose.”

Professor Stout squinted at me. “Then you must have gotten my memo. Did you read the whole thing? You must have done.”

I wracked my brains, trying to figure out what Professor Stout could mean. A message in a bottle, ejected from within the Eye? There were only so many possible candidates for that. Maisie had sent a message and a physical object with the Messenger Demon, almost a year ago, and that could not possibly have been Stout’s work. But there was one other.

“Evee,” I said slowly, “I think he’s talking about Mister Squiddy. A memo, full of mathematics. It’s the only thing which fits. Is that right?”

Evelyn snorted. “Great. If you’re correct, his ‘memo’ almost killed me.”

“And it taught me a lot of things,” I added quickly. “But, wait, Professor. That ‘memo’, that was clearly crafted by somebody who understood hyperdimensional mathematics, on my sort of level. I thought it was sent by my sister, Maisie. Have you ... worked with her, somehow? Have you seen her?”

Stout frowned and smacked his lips. “I work with a lot of postgraduate students, and I always make sure to credit them on paper, but I can’t recall them all off the top of my head. I’d have to check my notes. And those are at home. You’ll have to wait until tomorrow morning.”

“Maisie,” I repeated. “My twin. She looks exactly like me. Oh,” I sighed. “Or maybe she doesn’t, in this place. You don’t recognise me, not at all?”

Wilson Stout paused and frowned. “Twins.”

“Ah?”

“Twins. Twins!” he repeated, growing agitated again. “Twins, yes, that’s who I was trying to contact, who I was trying to call for. How did you know?”

“We ... we didn’t, we—”

Wilson tapped the table. “You need to find the twins, if you’re looking for a way out of here. They almost helped me, once. But they’re not really here, you see. They have to slip in and out. Stay beneath notice. They’ve very good at that. They’ve had to be, lest they get in too much trouble with the administration.”

“The administration?” Evelyn snapped. “You mean the Eye?”

“No, I mean the administration,” Stout almost laughed. “The non-teaching staff, the ‘bosses’. The ... oh, what do they call themselves? Director? Governor? Anyway, they don’t even know about the twins. That’s the trick. If you want to survive, remain unseen.”

“I’m one of the twins,” I said, sighing with exasperation. “You mean me and Maisie.”

“Are you certain of that?” Stout asked, with an odd little frown.

“ ... yes? I ... do you not mean myself and Maisie?”

Stout sighed and waved me away. Then he seemed to realise something, and quickly pulled up the edge of his left sleeve to check his watch. “My seven o’clock is almost here,” he said quickly. “You young ladies will not want to be around when they arrive, unless you want to meet the Director and the Governor for yourselves, up close. And you don’t, they’re terribly boring and long-winded, and they often come with an escort. If you’re on the shit-list then I would hurry on out of here before you’re trapped. There’s nowhere to hide in this room except under the desk, and I don’t think your wheelchair would fit.”

A cold hand crept up my spine. “Excuse me?”

“Aw shit,” said Raine.

"They're coming here?" Evee snapped. "The head of this 'administration' is coming right here?"

Raine said, "In about sixty seconds, by the looks of that watch! It's six fifty nine. Heather, grab Evee's wheelchair, we need to move, right now!"

The Saye Fox was already leaping off the chair and darting back toward the door, pausing to share a final lingering glance with Professor Stout. Wilson nodded at the Fox, his strange rubbery face creased with a melancholy smile of acceptance and loss. Raine followed quickly, grabbing the door handle and preparing to flee.

But I hesitated.

"Heather! Now!" Raine snapped.

"Professor," I said. "Wilson. We can get you out of here, the same as everybody else. There's no need for self-sacrifice. Come with us. Please!"

Evelyn twisted around in her chair to run me through with her eyes. "Heather! Heather, do not fucking strand me here! Move!"

Stout just shook his head, leaned back in his chair, and spread his hands across his stomach. He looked almost pleased with himself. "There's no need for that. I've become quite adept at leading the administration around in circles. It's terribly boring, an utter waste of a mind, but it stops them from bothering other people for a few hours. I'm quite safe here, thank you."

"But you're—"

"Also I don't think I can move. And I will cease to be coherent soon. Don't remind me of that, please. It's a horrible thought. You best get going before your friends get angry with you." He nodded to Evee. "And good luck, Evelyn Saye. I hope one day we can meet and chat under less pressured circumstances. It would be nice to tell you about your grandmother sometime."

"R-right ... right," I said. "Thank you, Professor Stout. And, well, good luck."

The Professor smiled through his thick and ragged beard. Then he called out: "Next time, Laurissa, you old fox!"

I grabbed the handles of Evelyn's wheelchair and raced back to the door. Evee held on tight, and held her tongue, silently fuming at our delay.

Raine was crouched, holding the handle, one ear pressed to the door. She gestured for me to crouch as well, then hissed: “We have company.”

“Shit!” Evelyn snapped.

“Footsteps, lots of them, coming this way,” Raine said. “Heather, you stay as low as you can while still pushing the chair, but be ready to get up and sprint. If we have to move, I’m gonna grab Evee and run, and dump the chair. Whatever happens, stick close to me. You understand?”

I nodded, heart racing behind my ribs. Sweat broke out down my back and on my palms. The throbbing wound in my left shin seemed suddenly far away.

Evelyn hissed: “Do not leave me—”

Raine whipped her head around and stared right into Evee’s eyes. “I will carry you naked over burning coals if I have to. Be ready to get carried.” She didn’t wait for a response, just reached out and grabbed my wrist. “Heather. Three, two, one — go!”

Raine threw the door wide and burst back into the office, back into the narrow corridor between the wall and the cubicle dividers, staying low. I scurried after her, pushing Evee’s wheelchair ahead of me. The Saye Fox darted past my heels; I caught a glimpse of something white held between her vulpine teeth, but she was moving too fast for me to see what it was. Had she stolen some of Wilson’s notes?

Raine paused with one shoulder against the office partitions opposite Stout’s door. I drew up behind her. The Fox leapt on ahead.

The sound of booted feet was thumping against the blue carpet, coming from all directions, jumbled into muted echoes by the maze of cubicles. Thump thump thump went the marching boots.

Raine nodded toward the waiting wall of windows, still wet with tiny droplets of rain.

“Go!” she hissed. “Exit, now!”

We scurried down the narrow passageway between the wall and the cubicles. I did my best to keep my head low, but my left leg was screaming with pain at every awkward crouch-walk step. Evelyn shrank into her wheelchair, terrified into silence. Raine hurried on, machete gripped in one fist, muscles rolling in her back.

But then she halted.

We'd barely made it twenty feet. Raine looked back, then forward, then back again.

Her eyes were wide — not with fear, but with the onrush of inevitable violence, bright and focused. She began to straighten up, rolling her shoulders, raising the naked blade of her machete. Her lips twitched with a smile.

I skidded to a halt, Evee's wheelchair stopping along with me.

"Raine?!" I hissed.

Evelyn joined in. "What the fuck are you doing, you rabid hound?! Move! Go!"

Raine grinned. Her eyes flickered down to me and Evee, then back up the way we'd come.

"We're cornered," she said, and made it sound like 'God, yes'. "They're in front and behind. Two groups. Listen to that. They've pinned us, cut us off. Like they knew we'd be here." She showed her teeth. "Time for a fight. You two can still run, I'll punch a hole to the door."

"Raine, no!" I hissed. "No, we can't! We can't win, not as we are now! We can't risk it! We—"

"No choice, sweet thing." Raine blew out a long breath and stood all the way up, eyes looking out across the cubicles. She was exposed, in full view. "Time for a last stand."

In the corner of my eye, the Saye Fox hopped up into Evee's lap. One of Evee's hands flashed, accepting something hard and white from within the Fox's mouth, then tucking it against her own chest.

"Bullshit!" Evelyn snapped. "Heather, get me against the cubicle wall, right now! And grab Raine! Get her head down, for pity's sake!"

"Eh?" Raine looked down. I peered around Evee's front.

In one white-knuckled fist, Evelyn was clutching a lump of very familiar white quartz.

The Fadestone.

Where had she gotten it? From her grandmother, the Saye Fox. Where had the Fox acquired such a thing? From within Wilson's office? How? Well, that could wait.

I didn't waste a second explaining to Raine what was going on or how any of this worked. I just pulled Evee's wheelchair flush against the wall of cubicle dividers, crushed myself next to her as tight as I could, then grabbed the side of Raine's tank top and hissed: "Down! Now, down girl! Down!"

Raine obeyed. She hit the floor almost without a sound, cramming herself in tight. Absolute trust, not a moment's hesitation, despite the hint of disappointment on her face.

"Good girl," I hissed. "You can fight stuff later! Right now, we hide!"

"Fair," Raine purred.

The booted footsteps were almost upon us — heavy, marching, moving in time, closing on us from left and right. They sounded as if they were right on the other side of the cubicle dividers. The two groups would turn opposite corners any moment, and we would be trapped in the middle.

Evelyn stuck out the fist that held the Fadestone. "Hold my wrist," she hissed, voice shaking. "I'll do the thinking and the concentrating to hide us, just do not let go, try not to move, and don't break my concentration. Grab on, now, for fuck's sake, do I have to say everything twice?!"

Raine and I did as Evee said — Raine wrapped a hand around Evee's arm, while I used both of mine to support and hold her wrist in case her arm got tired. The Saye Fox peeked over the arm of Evelyn's wheelchair too, her head wedged against Evee's side.

Then Evelyn went absolutely still and silent, as if she had instantly slipped into deep meditation. Her soft blue eyes locked onto the Fadestone.

Thump thump thump went the approaching boots, shaking the cubicle dividers, drumming through the floor.

“Whatever you do,” Evelyn whispered, “do not break my concentration. Do. Not. Break. My. Concentration. Or we’re all dead.”

Thump thump thump.

Raine put a hand over her own mouth. I clamped my lips shut.

“We are simply not here,” Evelyn whispered, chanting a mantra to herself to hold our invisibility strong. “We are not here. We are not here. Not here. Not here. Not. Here. Not.”

bedlam boundary – 24.15

Over my long and lonely teenage decade — of Eye-borne nocturnal mathematics lessons, of daylight nightmares of the spirit-world menagerie, and of uncontrolled Slips to the otherworldly environs of a thousand Outside dimensions — I had become quite the seasoned veteran in the arts of hiding and skulking, to avoid the attention of vast and unknowable intelligences.

I had scurried from rock to rock on my hands and knees as shivering titans prowled blasted landscapes; I had wormed into nooks and crannies in the ground as blistering sunlight scorched burnt jungles to smoke and ash; I had gone silent and still and curled up in the fetal position, pretending to be dead, as alien forms and gibbering hungers had stalked by my frozen body. I had hidden everywhere — in the dark, in holes, beneath rotten wood, behind piles of flesh and mounds of earth and crammed into the metal cavities of world-machine god-things. Long before ever I realised my true nature and built my tentacles, I had acted like the Outsider cephalopod hybrid I always was, slipping into cracks in the rock to conceal myself from larger predators, squeezing myself down tight to dodge the jaws of swifter sharks and hunting rays and monsters in the cold void beyond.

I had never attempted such a habitual feat beneath stark fluorescent lights, in a seemingly mundane office, surrounded by scratchy carpet and sensibly upright walls.

But there we were — myself, Raine, Evelyn, and the Saye Fox — hunched down tight against a flimsy blue cubicle divider, in a dream of a very mundane, very boring, very soporific open-plan office. And we weren't even tucked out of the way inside one of the cubicles. That would have been cause for some hope, at least. Perhaps we could have stayed very quiet and very still, like children hiding under a bed. But no, we were blocking practically one third of the passageway along the back wall, smack bang in the way of anybody who was heading for Wilson's Stout's office. His door was barely twenty feet to our left, wide open. But we had no choice. Evelyn's wheelchair could not be folded up or tucked out of the way. Here was where we made our stand — or our crouch, to torture the metaphor.

Only the Fadestone kept us hidden, clutched tightly in Evelyn's fist, a promise as-yet untested.

Raine and I gripped Evelyn's hand and arm, so the effect of the stone might cover us all. The Saye Fox peered over the arm of Evelyn's wheelchair — and so did the Praem Plushie, though I had not seen her move. Evelyn's muttered mantra of 'not here' faded away to nothing. She closed her lips. Her eyelids drooped, heavy with meditative concentration.

Thump thump thump went the footsteps on the office floor, drawing closer with every footfall. The cubicle wall vibrated against my back. Sweat beaded at my hairline. My heart was going a thousand miles an hour.

In a way, we were being cornered by two sets of tendrils or feelers, extended by an entity no less vast and alien than any Outsider leviathan I had hidden from as a teenager — the institution of Cygnet Asylum itself was reaching out to ensnare us.

Raine and I shared one last glance. I almost sobbed. Was this the end? Raine's free hand tightened on the grip of her naked machete. I shook my head. Don't break the spell!

And then our pursuers were upon us.

Four armoured figures rounded a corner to our right, roughly twenty feet away, emerging from within the maze of cubicles and cubby holes and computer desks. They wore black uniforms with full helmets and mirrored face plates. Each one carried a sub-machine gun slung across the chest. The uniforms bore insignia over the heart — a trio of tentacles, impaled on a spike.

Knights! I swallowed a gasp of recognition.

The quartet of Knights marched in perfect time, booted footfalls thumping on the carpet in a steady rhythm, approaching down the narrow corridor between the cubicle dividers and the bone-pale surface of the back wall. They were out of place among the grey and blue surroundings of the office, with greasy fluorescent light reflecting off their helmets, like confused sea-life dumped into a biome which had no place for them — or like an armed response team raiding a newspaper.

They did not pause in their advance, nor move their heads, nor raise their weapons. They did not seem to notice us at all.

My heart back flipped with relief. The Fadestone was working!

But then, as the Knights drew closer, I realised another figure was walking at the centre of the formation, like the middle dot of a five on the face of a die.

It was Seven Shades of Sunlight.

Sevens wore the mask of the Yellow Princess, but with several major alterations. Ice blue eyes glittered with razor-sharp intensity, set in her usual pale complexion, with her usual high cheekbones and fine little nose. Dark bags shone beneath her eye sockets, only partially concealed by make-up; I was never an expert in foundation and powder and blush, but even I could tell the make-up was a very slapdash job. I had never seen such an imperfection in the Yellow Princess before.

Her blonde hair was longer than usual, reaching past her shoulders in a mess of uneven curls, as if she hadn't yet found an opportunity to apply a comb to her scalp that morning. Her crisp white blouse had sprouted fancy ruffles and lace at the collar and cuffs, like a 17th century dandy, but had also gained a landscape of tell-tale creases and wrinkles. Her long yellow skirt had grown a flared hem and paired rows of bunched lacing about her calves. But the skirt had also been torn — all the way up one side, in a massive slit which ended in the middle of Sevens' left thigh; the tear was neat and tidy and very straight, as if it had been inflicted on purpose rather than by accident or in some unplanned tussle. Her confident stride made plain the reason: the tear allowed her to walk faster, fast enough to keep up with the Knights. Her sensible yet elegant shoes had been replaced by a pair of bright yellow trainers, with loose laces tucked beneath the tongues.

She carried a clipboard over one arm, festooned with papers and sticky notes. A pencil was stuck behind one elegant ear; another pencil was jammed between her teeth as she chewed on the end. A third pencil dangled on a string from the top of the clipboard. A series of pens were stuck into the breast pocket of her blouse; one of the pens had leaked green ink into the white fabric.

Seven-Shades-of-Stressed-Out-Scribe looked rumpled and haggard.

Like the Knights, Sevens did not see us sitting on the floor, even as my eyes went wide and my mouth hung open with a low gasp. Raine nudged my thigh with her elbow, reminding me not to break Eevee's concentration.

But Sevens was right there! I shared a glance with Raine, trying to speak with my eyes. She shook her head.

But—!

A second quartet of Knights rounded the distant corner on our left, much further away than Sevens and her Knightly bodyguards. These fresh four Knights marched down the passageway as well, heading toward us; if they had been planning a flanking manoeuvre to pin us here, it would have been quite successful if not for the timely present of the Fadestone. We were pinned between the two groups.

The second quartet marched up to Wilson Stout's office, then stopped just short of the open door.

This second group also escorted a fifth figure in their middle, flanking her like bodyguards. She stopped when the Knights stopped.

I had no idea who she was.

She wore a long white laboratory coat over a pair of jeans and a ribbed sweater the colour of congealed coffee — an exact match for the stolen sweater I now wore beneath my yellow blanket. A great mass of dark blonde hair fell down her back, a mane of tangled tresses, swept away from her forehead by a careless hand. By the lines on her face and the natural sagging of her skin she looked to be in her late fifties or perhaps early sixties — yet she had no crow's feet around her eyes, no laugh or frown lines, no crinkling at the corners of her mouth, no sun damage on her skin, no moles, no blemishes, nothing. She stood with a straight and unbowed back, hands in her lab coat pockets, head held high with the casual indifference of somebody who did not care for anything beneath her nose. Her complexion was impossible to place — she might have been southern European, or middle eastern, or central Asian, or a dozen other ethnicities all mixed together. She had a high nose, powerful cheekbones, and a wide mouth with colourless lips. She wore no make-up or jewellery, except for a dozen analogue wristwatches on her right forearm, exposed by the rolled-up sleeve of her lab coat; the watches were all different makes and models, all set to different times, ticking away at different speeds.

She had eyes the colour of coral and blossoms, of the sky at dawn in the hours before rain, of flesh and meat and fresh-drained blood mixed with cold seawater.

Those eyes were distracted and absent; her gaze slid over Sevens, approaching down the passageway, then onto the wall, then the open door to Stout's office, then away over the tops of the cubicle dividers. She glanced downward just once, right at me and Raine and Evelyn and the Saye Fox.

When our eyes met, she saw me.

I knew with the certainty of a knife in my throat that she saw me, completely — right through the Fadestone. But she did not comprehend that I was present, or what I was, or what any of me meant.

Then she looked away again, eyes always in motion.

Blood left my face. My heart stilled. I did not recognise the woman in the lab coat, not at all.

But I knew what I was looking at.

Seven-Shades-of-Swiftly-Stepping walked right past us, inside the marching cage of her Knightly escort; she glanced down at us too, as if we were a passing notion or a wild fancy. Her eyes met mine; unlike her counterpart, Sevens frowned as if she really saw something there, saw my eyes, and understood on some subconscious level that some trick was concealing the truth from her mind. I wiggled my eyebrows, desperate to attract her attention, but she just shook her head as if dismissing a stray thought.

The momentum of the Knights carried her onward, past our huddled group. She turned her eyes away from us, and drew up on the opposite side of the door to Wilson Stout's office.

Raine whispered: "The moment they enter that room, we get up and we run. Be ready."

I stuck one hand inside my yellow blanket, reaching for the gift from the King in Yellow. I whispered, barely more than a breath. "I need to give her the hilt! The bladeless hilt from the King in Yellow!"

“Mmm,” Raine purred. “I don’t know about that, sweet thing.”

Evelyn kept her eyes fixed on the Fadestone, but she spoke in a murmur: “We can hide and move. It can be done. Just don’t break my concentration.”

“This might be my only chance!” I hissed. “And that other woman, she’s—”

“Good morning, Governor,” said Seven-Shades-of-Strident-Salutation, cutting across my words.

She sounded harried and breathless. Her voice didn’t carry the tone and timbre of the Yellow Princess. This was not just an alteration, it was a different mask, a different person altogether. Sevens had addressed the woman in the lab coat, but received no answer. She quickly checked her clipboard, flipping through loose pages, peering at sticky notes.

“We had a major incident yesterday,” said this new Sevens. “A full-blown revolt. Several major injuries, a lot of minor injuries to both staff and patients, and a secondary incident with some ... some regrettable deaths. Sixteen patients still unaccounted for, at large, or escaped the grounds entirely. A right fine mess, a bloody great fuck up.” Sevens huffed and looked up. “Governor? Are you listening to me?”

The woman in the lab coat clearly wasn’t paying attention. She wasn’t even looking at Sevens; she was gazing off across the office. At Sevens’ prompting she dragged her eyes back around, but did not seem to focus.

“Mm,” grunted the woman in the lab coat — the Governor. “Good morning, Director.”

Her voice was floaty and flimsy, like cobwebs on the wind. Her accent was unremarkable English, I couldn’t place it.

I whispered to Raine: “The Director and the Governor. So they are two different people. And if that’s Sevens—”

“That’s Sevens?” Raine hissed. “Oof.”

“Mm! Which means the other woman is ... no, no, it can’t be, there’s no way it could be so human.”

Evelyn swallowed. Perhaps this concept was disturbing her concentration. I could hardly blame her. It was making my bowels shake.

Sevens huffed a big sigh. “Yes, good morning. Hello. Please concentrate.” She clicked her fingers before the Governor’s face, three times. “Look, okay, we’ll talk about the incident later, we—”

But the Governor was already looking away, running her eyes up and down the chrome frame of the door to Stout’s office. “I must get back to the archives,” she said. She sounded like she was talking to herself. “There’s so much to go through. So many case files. I need to keep going, or I’ll never finish. Never finish. Have to read it all.”

“Yes, yes,” Sevens huffed again. “You can do that in a few minutes. First we need to check in on our consultant and see if he can derive a pattern from yesterday. Then we need an all-hands meeting. All the nurses, at least. Get everyone ready for finding our fugitives and get them back on track. Then ... ”

Sevens trailed off, blinking in surprise. She had followed the direction of the Governor’s pinkish eyes. She leaned forward to peer through the open door of Stout’s office.

Professor Stout called out from inside. “Hullo there! Good morning!”

“Why is this door already open?!” Sevens shrieked. From zero to sixty in the blink of an eye; I had never seen the Princess lose her temper before, let alone screaming at the top of her lungs. “How?! Nobody knows the code, it’s not even consistent! Only the Governor can even read it!”

Stout replied from within. “I felt like I needed a breath of fresh air, that’s all. A morning stroll! You should try it sometime!”

Sevens whirled away from the door. One hand clutched and clawed at her own hair while the other brandished her clipboard, notes flapping as she waved it up and down. Her eyes bulged from their sockets. She went red in the face, spitting mad. “I can’t believe this!” she shouted. “I can’t— I can’t— I can’t do this anymore!”

She hurled the clipboard onto the floor. It landed with a dull, unsatisfying slap of plastic on carpet. She followed up with a stamp of one foot, but that was no better, so she suddenly lashed out and kicked the wall — thud, just as unyielding and disappointing.

Sevens keened through her teeth at the white plaster of the wall, as if it was personally responsible for being too sturdy.

The Knights politely backed away, making space for Sevens to have a tantrum.

"I can't keep control of every single spinning plate in this place, I can't!" she screamed. "Nothing does what it's supposed to! The pieces move on their own and the set itself shuffles about when I'm not looking!" She slapped the chrome door frame with an open hand. One of the Knights ducked in close and picked up her clipboard, then stepped back before Sevens-Shades-of-Scorching-Spleen could re-target her rage. "Fuck this! Fuck all of this! I'm fucking done! I can't!"

"Mm," grunted the Governor. "It's just a door."

"I've had enough, I've had enough of all this!" Sevens began to sob, lowering her face into her hands. "I can't do this, I can't keep control of all this, none of it fits together, none of it works, none of it woooooorks!" She turned the final word into a screech of frustration, lifting her face from her hands and baring her teeth, wide-eyed with panting anger and wet-streaked eyes.

"Oh, Sevens," I whispered to myself.

"Didn't realise she was so high-strung," Raine hissed.

"This is nothing like her, usually," I whispered back. "She's as trapped as the rest of us, I think."

Sevens just stood there panting for breath, on the verge of recovery or breakdown. The Governor did nothing to comfort or calm her. Eventually Sevens cleared her throat, wiped stray hairs out of her face, and straightened up. She took several long, slow, deep breaths. She held out a hand to the Knight who had picked up her clipboard, murmuring a thank you as her notes were returned.

"Thank you, yes." She glanced at the Knights, her voice lowered and meek, all rage forgotten. "Um, you four, would you please fan out and check the offices, to see if there's anything else out of place? Some patients may have gotten in here. Perhaps they got the door open, somehow, though I don't see how that would be possible."

"Ma'am," said one of the Knights, voice trapped behind black fabric and padded armour. The Knight sounded just as androgynous as when we'd last met them. "We're detailed to escort you. It's not safe so soon after a riot."

Sevens gestured at the Governor and her matching quartet of Knights. "It's fine," said Seven-Shades-of-Strictly-Regulated-Systems. "I'll be with the Governor the whole time, with these other four guards. Just fan out and check for ten minutes while we have a meeting with Stout, then come back. I won't go anywhere alone."

Sevens' four Knights all looked at each other, then nodded in unison. "Yes, ma'am," they all echoed.

The four Knights turned and marched off the way they'd come, right past myself and my friends. They split up quickly, vanishing into the maze of cubicles, all heading in different directions. One of them lingered briefly, staring down at us through the mirrored visor. Raine readied herself to pounce, but I shook my head. The Knight leaned over the edge of the cubicle divider, checking behind us, then turned away and carried on.

Raine let out a slow breath, knuckles tight on her machete. I shivered with relief. We had to do everything we could to avoid open conflict with the Knights. They were not our target, they were little better than slaves of the institution, no different than us.

"Shall we?" said Sevens to the Governor, gesturing into Stout's office.

The Governor went first, with two Knights in front of her and two Knights behind. As the first group passed through the doorway and into the office, Raine whispered in my ear: "We go as soon as Sevens is inside. Be ready."

"No!" I hissed back. "Raine, I have to give her the hilt! I have to! This might be our only chance."

Raine locked eyes with me. I frowned, trying to make my face blaze with determination.

Raine nodded. "Alright," she whispered. "One condition. You let me do it."

I nodded. "As long as she gets the hilt, I don't care if we have to throw it at her or slap her with it or ... right."

A flicker of a grin passed across Raine's lips. "I'll do one better than that. Let's make sure she gets the message loud and clear."

"Okay, good girl," I hissed. "Good girl."

Raine's eyes flickered back to the door. "Here she goes. On three, I let go of Eevee, and you slap the hilt into my hand. Then grab Eevee's wheelchair, be ready to run."

The last of the four Knights was stepping through the doorway and into Stout's office. Seven-Shades-of-Sunlight was just turning to follow.

"One — two — three!"

Raine let go of Eevee's hand and shot to her feet. I let go as well, fumbling inside my yellow blanket for the weighty metal of the Yellow King's empty hilt. Eevee snatched her own arm back, the Fadestone with it. The Fox ducked back down into Eevee's lap. The Praem Plushie was already tucked in tight.

Our disguise collapsed.

We must have appeared out of nowhere in Sevens' peripheral vision — three girls, one fox, and one wheelchair, crammed against the cubicle dividers where a moment ago there had been only empty air. She whirled on the spot, right before Stout's door, jaw dropping, cold blue eyes flying wide.

I slapped the empty hilt into Raine's waiting hand.

Sevens began to raise one arm, pointing toward Raine and the rest of us. Her mouth widened for a shout — guards, guards, they're right here!

Raine sprinted the gap in the time it took Sevens to draw the necessary breath. She cut off Sevens' shout with her own lips, sealing the mouth of the Yellow Princess with a sudden kiss. Sevens' eyes flew wide, trying to scramble back, but Raine had looped one arm around Sevens' slender waist.

I scrambled to my feet and grabbed the handles of Eevee's wheelchair, trying not to gape at Raine's daring plan.

Raine ripped back from the kiss, leaving Sevens a spluttering mess. Before Sevens could recover, Raine pressed the golden hilt into Sevens' free hand.

"Present from your dad! Sorry about the door! And nice lips," Raine shouted — then turned and sprinted back toward me and Evee.

“Run! Go! Back doors, now!”

“I’m sorry, Sevens!” I shouted past Raine. “It was the only way! I’ll free you later!”

Seven-Shades-of-Spent-and-Spluttering gaped at me in confusion, then yelled, “I’m not your kind of crazy! I am not!”

“That again,” I hissed, then turned and fled, racing toward the wall of rain-splattered windows, pushing Evelyn’s wheelchair like an out-of-control shopping cart.

Raine darted ahead of me and Evee, legs pumping, taking the lead in our escape. We had a straight shot to the door, straight down the narrow passage between the cubicles and the wall. Most of the four Knights had already pushed too deep into the tangle of cubicles and computers to turn around and catch us; two of them actually blundered into the dividers, going down in a tangle of collapsing chest-high walls and the weight of their own equipment. One of them looked lost in the maze of cubicles, turning left, then right, then left again in an effort to reach us.

But one Knight had not yet gone too deep. A black armoured form hurried to intercept us, approaching our route from the side.

“You!” Raine yelled, pointing her machete at the Knight. “Back! I won’t go easy!”

The Knight plunged out into the passageway, right into our path. Evelyn gasped. The Fox let out a series of yip-yowls from Evee’s lap. The Knight’s hands went for the big black shiny gun, the weapon, the final word in the monopoly of violence. But then the Knight hesitated, as if thinking better of threatening us.

Raine sprinted right at the Knight. A grin ripped across her face. She wound back her machete to stab through a gap in the Knight’s armour, ready to gut and fillet our foe.

“Raine, no!” I yelped.

At the last second, Raine thrust her weapon forward — and turned it to the side. She smacked the Knight across the faceplate with the flat of her blade, with a sharp, resounding crack.

The Knight staggered back more in surprise than pain, crashing down into a cubicle divider.

Two black-gloved hands rose in surrender.

“Heather says you get to live!” Raine pointed her machete at the mirrored face-plate. “Stay down!”

Raine raced past the fallen Knight, leaping toward our exit. I followed, pushing Evelyn’s wheelchair past the Knight’s boots. The empty visor stared upward at me, eyes invisible behind the mask of authority.

“Sorry, sorry!” I yelped — then swallowed a hiccup. “Hic! Sorry!”

We hit the wall of windows seconds later. Raine slammed the bar-handle down and popped the door, leaping out into the drizzling rain. A gust of chill air whipped at my yellow blanket, threatening to drag me back into the offices. Raine held the way open for me and Evelyn. I shoved Evelyn’s wheelchair over the lip, as if I might not be able to follow. But then Raine reached back inside and yanked me out by one wrist, pulling me to freedom on my shaky, adrenaline-flushed legs. Damp air coated my face. The Fox whined at the sudden cold, at the moisture in the air, snuggling deeper into Eevee’s lap.

We were free — out in the gravel-and-concrete opening between two featureless wings of Cygnet Asylum, flanked on three sides by damp brick and dark windows.

Raine slammed the door behind us.

“Go! Go!” she pointed toward the open end of the space. The verdant grounds rolled off into the distance, the hills dusted with rain, the distant trees shivering in the breeze. “Don’t stop now!”

We all turned and fled, leaving behind the Director and the Governor and their eight unwitting bodyguards.

But as we did, I glanced back one last time, peering through the rain-fogged glass.

The ‘Governor’ — the pink-eyed, distracted woman in a laboratory coat — had emerged from Stout’s office, presumably drawn by all the shouting and commotion. She was just standing there, hands deep in her pockets, chin held high, eyes a glassy distance inside an aged and lonely face.

Her gaze met mine for a single fleeting heartbeat.

And I knew, as I stared into that pink-rimmed empty gaze, that the one in ultimate control of Cygnet Asylum did not comprehend anything that she saw.

* * *

“That woman was the Eye.”

Misty rain and damp-air haze could not blot out my words with static drums; the heavier drops falling from the leaves of the trees were too infrequent and too far away to interrupt my thoughts, landing on mulch and spongy earth, soaked into loam and clay. The chill air was a bare whisper, as if climate and weather had surrendered to the aesthetic demands of the asylum grounds, blunted to little more than a touch of cold upon one’s nose, serving merely to heighten the cosy warmth inside one’s clothes, not enough to make my teeth chatter and blur upon the truth. The hard pad of concrete ground, the uprights of dark-stained wood, the ring of benches, the fake plastic roof tiles — none of it could absorb my voice and hide what I spoke.

Cygnet Asylum itself made no effort to silence me.

Twenty minutes after our daring escape from the back offices of the hospital building, we were holed up deep in the little woodland which stretched across the rear of the asylum grounds, part of the same woods which Raine and I had crossed on the previous day. We had stumbled across the perfect shelter — a permanent pavilion or gazebo structure, a little way off the main paths of wood chips between the neat borders, like the abandoned memory of a bandstand which had not heard music in decades.

The pavilion was a heptagon, with seven sides — a detail I could not help but sigh at upon discovery. It was not much, just a concrete foundation with some wooden pillars, holding up a cheap plastic roof shaped to look like imitation tiles, as if this was some kind of fairy cottage in the forest with the walls ripped away and the contents removed. The concrete floor was host to four benches, gathered around a very empty, very dead, very clean fire-pit, probably never used. The pavilion was hardly a secure location; we would be spotted the moment anybody emerged from between the trees and looked in our direction. But it was dry and it kept the rain off our heads, so there was where we stopped, surrounded by dripping trees and rustling leaves.

Raine had made us keep moving until she was certain we weren't being followed. We hadn't passed a single patient out in the grounds, neither on the lawns nor between the trees. Either it was too early in the morning, or the foul weather was keeping everyone indoors. The weather was also horribly paradoxical — there were no clouds in the sky, only the black and wrinkled underside of the Eye. Where was the rain falling from? I tried not to think about that too hard.

When we'd finally taken shelter, Raine had pulled the towels from last night out of the carrier bag on Eeve's wheelchair, and forced me to dry myself first, wiping the rain off my face and out of my hair. She'd done the same for Evelyn, then offered the towel to the Fox. Evelyn had said nothing, sunken down in her wheelchair, recovering from the shock and adrenaline of our escape. The Fox had trotted away from Raine, casting disapproving glances at the big fluffy towel.

Raine had changed the dressing on my wound again. Evelyn had demanded something to eat, and scarfed down one of our remaining sandwiches, barely saying a word. I parked her wheelchair for her, at the end of one of the benches, before sitting down myself and trying to still my racing heart. Raine took guard duty, eyes high on the tree line, while the Fox circled and sniffed, staying out of the drizzle.

And then I had spoken the truth.

Evelyn looked up, framed by the trees and the misty rain. I wished I could bundle her up in bed, somewhere warm and safe and dry. She'd been watching the Saye Fox with tired eyes, so worn-out and exhausted, despite our night's sleep. Raine didn't waver from her guard duty, but she was well within earshot, she must have heard my words too.

"Heather," Evelyn said, in the exact tone one might say, 'Please, no.'

"I mean it, Eeve," I said. "That woman was the Eye. I'm certain of that."

Raine spoke without looking away from the trees. "What, the blonde science gilf back there?"

Evelyn clenched her jaw and screwed up her eyes. "We have more than enough to process and think about without entertaining absurdist fantasies, thank you. The Eye has not been compressed down into a science gilf. And Raine, if you speak those words again I will find something to hit you with, so help me God.”

“Gilf?” I echoed, twisting around to look at Raine. She was standing a few feet away, damp with moisture from our flight across the grounds, her hair sticking up where she’d run a hand across her scalp. “I’m sorry, what does that mean?”

Raine finally glanced away from the trees and raised her eyebrows at me. “No shit?”

“No, Raine, I’m being serious. What does that mean?”

“Stop!” Evelyn snapped. “Just, both of you. Do not.”

Raine smirked, struggling to keep her mouth shut against the power of a laugh brewing behind her lips. I huffed and shrugged, a little miffed. “Evee, how can I be expected to keep up with this if you won’t—”

“They’re like milfs,” Evelyn said, with a tone of bone-deep exasperation, like she was talking to a very dim child. “Remember milfs? Like you find on the internet. Can we please move on from this point?”

The Praem Plushie in Evee’s lap seemed to be staring at me with her flat, empty eyes, willing me to let Evee have this one. I cleared my throat and nodded. “Okay, I understand.”

“I doubt that very much,” Evelyn muttered. “Look, Heather, there is no way that woman was the Eye.”

“She was looking at things without really seeing them,” I said.

“That’s what gave me the idea. Plus, she was the ‘Governor’, correct? Sevens was the Director — a rather obvious and silly title, but it makes sense. So that other woman was the Governor. That was the Eye.”

Evelyn sighed heavily and rubbed at her forehead. She watched the Fox for a long moment, nosing her way around the legs of the benches, sniffing at the concrete, bushy tail swishing back and forth. The Fox paused and met Evee’s eyes in return.

“There’s more evidence, too,” I went on after a moment. “Did you see her jumper? The awful cold brown colour? It matches the one Raine found for me.” I pinched a corner of the ratty old jumper and held it out. "She's the big watcher, I'm the little watcher. It's all symbolic. And Sevens said she was the only one who can usually operate the lock to Stout's room. Brain-math!"

"That woman sounded like you, Heather," Raine said. "Is that a clue as well?"

"Ah? Sorry?" I frowned in mystified incomprehension. "She sounded like me?"

Raine nodded, quickly returning her eyes to the trees, watching for any hidden approaches. "She had your accent, sweet thing. Southerner. Reading, right?"

"Oh," I said, putting a self-conscious hand to my mouth. "I ... she just sounded normal to me. I didn't pick up on that at all. Gosh."

Evelyn sighed like a car tire about to blow. "Heather, you are the last person to whom I should have to explain this. The Eye is so vast, so beyond human form or human thought, that cramming it down into a human body is impossible."

"Why?" I said. "Evee, everything else here has been 'crammed down' into human form. This whole place is a metaphor. An entire dimension turned into a parody of a hospital from my memories. I rewrote reality and made it into a play! Why can't the Eye play a human being? Why not?"

Evelyn glared at me sidelong. "Because I don't like it."

I blinked in surprise. "Ah?"

"I'm making an effort to be honest with myself, and with you," she said. "I don't like what that implies. If you've somehow humanised the Eye, what are we supposed to do? Kill her? Have a sit down with her, with tea and cakes? Kidnap her? Entice her into a lesbian romance? Ha!" Evelyn barked with sudden laughter. She went to slap her own knee, but her prosthetic wasn't there, and she just tapped the air in front of her stump. "That's probably exactly what Sevens has in mind, isn't it? Show the Eye the wonders of getting her pussy munched down on, then she'll come around and we'll all be freed. Yes, great plan!"

Raine muttered: "Sounds good to me."

"Yes," Evelyn spat, dripping venom. "It would do. And that's why it's not working."

I shook my head. "I don't think that's what Sevens intends, nor would any of those things be possible. And I do hope Sevens is going to be okay. I hope she knows what to do with that sword hilt."

Raine clucked her tongue. "Looked like she needed a good fuck to get her mind off her work."

"Well," I cleared my throat. "That too. You're ... not wrong, I think. Though I wouldn't be so crude about it."

Evelyn snorted. "Let's hope she uses the sword to cut off the Eye's head."

Raine drew a breath between her teeth. "Waste of a good gilf."

I ignored that word. "So, Evee, you think I'm right?"

Evelyn sighed. "I suspect you might be, but I hope you aren't. If you're correct, I have no idea how we would even begin to approach her as a problem. Say we free Twil and Zheng, and take over the asylum with a second Lozzie-sparked revolt — what then? What do we do, tie her up and try to explain to her why all this is bad? This can't be resolved with a philosophical debate, Heather. Few things can."

"I could tie up a gilf and turn her right with some philosophy," Raine muttered.

Evee ignored that. "This is a serious question, Heather. What do we do about the Eye?"

My turn to sigh. "I ... I don't know yet. Planning like this is difficult. I feel like I'm slower than I should be, missing six sevenths of what I'm used to, I—"

"And you're the only one tapped into the dream," Evelyn interrupted. "That trick with Praem back there, getting the door open. You're wired into this place, this reality, probably because you helped create it. So, think hard. What do we do with the Eye?"

I stared out of the pavilion, at the dripping leaves of the trees all around. I lifted a corner of the damp towel from my shoulders and ran it over my hair again. The yellow blanket had somehow kept my shoulders warm and dry even as we had dashed through the misting raindrops. I felt cosy inside, shaken by the realisation of that strange woman's identity, but determined that we were on the right path.

“This is her institution—”

Evelyn cut me off with a hiss. “Must we call it a ‘her’?”

I shrugged. “Right now the Eye is wearing a human form and a human face. I think it’s probably for the best.” I gestured at the Praem Plushie with one hand. “I treated Praem the same way, when you first put her in a body, and that turned out to be the right call in the long run, despite your initial misgivings. Right now, right here, in this dream, the Eye is a person. A ‘gilt’ in her sixties.”

Evelyn winced. Raine snorted.

“Whatever you do,” Evelyn drawled. “Do not use that word to ... ‘her’ face. Not that I think we should get anywhere near her, certainly not speak to her.”

“All right?” I said. “All right, okay. I won’t.” I frowned in private confusion. Milves and gilves were too confusing for me. “As I was saying,” I carried on. “This is her institution. Cygnet Asylum belongs to her. Sevens is the Director, but that just means she’s responsible for keeping things running, I think that’s why she was so stressed back there. She’s running the narrative somehow, that’s the role she’s been forced into here. But the Eye—”

“Eileen,” Raine suggested.

Evelyn made a sound like an angry gerbil. “Absolutely not. Raine, shut up. Stop talking.”

Raine began to laugh, but I nodded in agreement with Eevee.

“Actually, yes. I don’t think it’s a good idea for us to name her. If she has a name, she’ll tell us. She’s the Governor, or the Eye. I’m serious, Raine. Please.”

Raine put up her hands. “Sure thing, sweet thing. You’re the boss.”

“Good girl,” I said, almost on reflex. I was getting far too used to that. “Right, now, if we’re quite done with the interruptions?” I glanced at both Raine and Eevee. Raine bowed her head. Evelyn cleared her throat. “Right. This is the Eye’s institution. I think that’s partly what this nightmare version of Cygnet is. This is a representation of how she sees the world, how she interacts with reality — as a carceral institution, for observing all the mentally ill girls within. Now, yes, I’ve obviously influenced the metaphor as well, but this place within the metaphor belongs to her. So, if we take it over and tear it down, that might ... change her."

Evelyn sighed. "Great. We're applying dream logic to the mind of an Outsider god. What could possibly go wrong?"

"The play's the thing," I recited. "I think this might be the only way to communicate with her. Via reality itself."

Evelyn shook her head, running her tongue over her teeth behind her lips, digging out fragments of the sandwich she'd just eaten. Raine looked away, staring out into the dripping woods. The Saye Fox padded up to us, to where Evelyn and I sat side by side. She plopped down on the concrete, sitting on her haunches, and looked up at us.

"Ah," I said softly. "I didn't get a chance to thank you earlier, did I? For grabbing the Fadestone off Stout. Thank you." I bowed my head to the Fox. "Without you, I don't think we would have made it out of there. Thank you ... Laurissa."

The Fox just tilted her head to one side, ears standing upright and alert. For a long moment, nobody said a word. I glanced sidelong at Evelyn.

She was staring back at the Fox with an expression I'd never seen before, a strange and heady cocktail of anxiety, loss, and hope.

"Evee?" I said her name very gently.

Evelyn snapped out of her reverie with a sharp sigh. "Yes, yes. I'm fine. I'm just ... " She gestured at the Fox — at Laurissa Saye, her own grandmother. "This is a lot to take in. I'm sorry I can't digest your theory right now, Heather. That is my grandmother. I can't deal with that right now, I simply can't."

The Saye Fox responded to Evelyn's anxiety by padding closer and rubbing her vulpine snout against the ankle of Evelyn's withered leg. Evee swallowed, very hard and very dry, but she did not chase the Fox away. She let out a shuddering breath.

"It is a lot to deal with, Evee," I said gently. "I'm here if you want to —"

"She achieved the miracle my mother never could." Evee spoke without looking at me, totally focused on the Fox. "Immortality, or at least major extension of life. She must have seeped out of her own body, her corpse, maybe into the worms that ate her flesh after death. The beetles, the bugs, even the microbes. Then they got eaten by moles, shrews, the like, anything larger, anything higher up the systems of biology. Accumulating in the food chain like a toxin, concentrating upward over time. Eventually a fox ate enough of her, enough distributed particles, enough pieces of her soul to put them back together into something like her mind.” Evelyn sighed and reached down; the Fox sniffed at her fingers. Evelyn repeated the gesture with the Praem Plushie; the Fox sniffed Praem, then nudged the Plushie with her snout.

“Introducing her to her great-granddaughter?” I asked.

“They’ve already met.” Evelyn returned the Praem Plushie to her own lap. “Do you know I never met her in life? Did I ever tell you about that? She died when I was two. No memories of her. Absolutely nothing.”

“Evee ... ”

“The point I’m making, Heather, is that we are not looking at my grandmother’s reincarnation. We are looking at an actual fox, possessed by the spirit of a dead mage.”

Awkward silence fell. I swallowed, unsure what to say.

Evelyn muttered: “Am I going to end up like that, after I die? Will I end up as worms and bugs, and then moles and birds, then ... ”

Raine said, “Quicker ways to get a tail if you wanna turn into a fox, Evee. You’d look very fetching with cute little fox ears.”

“Tch,” Evelyn tutted and waved that away.

I said, “Are you going to ... to say ... I don’t know, say hello to her?”

Evelyn side-eyed me. “I think we’re a bit past that.”

“Well, at least thank her for the Fadestone.”

Evelyn nodded. She rummaged inside her grey dressing gown and pulled out the lump of white quartz. “Mm. Quite a trick, that. I wonder if she knew Stout would have the stone. Or if it was just quick thinking. Either way, well done.”

The Fox let out a soft ‘Yeerp.’

Raine said: "Clue me in here, magic lady."

"If you pledge to never call me that again," replied Evee.

"How come the magic hiding stone worked when your circles didn't?" Raine clucked her tongue. "And this isn't just idle curiosity, this is serious. If stuff around here works only part of the time, I might need to know."

Evelyn held up the Fadestone. The white quartz glinted in the rainy light. I did my best not to frown at the thing — even now I didn't like it very much, the way it hid things from my sight when I wasn't paying attention.

"Because it's a physical prop," said Evee. "That's my best guess."

"Sorry?" I said. "What do you mean?"

Evelyn snorted. "We're in a play, right? The stone is a nice large object, like on a stage. It's a prop, so it works how it should."

"Huh," Raine grunted. She did not seem convinced. I wasn't quite sure about that either.

"Raine," I said, twisting around on the bench to look at her directly. "I wanted to thank you as well."

Raine cracked a grin. "All you gotta do is call me a good girl."

"Yes, good girl," I said. "Thank you for not hurting that Knight. At least, not too badly. I suppose you did knock it onto its backside. Still, you could have run it through. Thank you for showing restraint."

"Ahhhh, hmm," Raine said, losing ninety percent of her grin. "You're welcome."

"Oh? Raine, what's wrong?"

Raine grumbled down in her throat. "Didn't like pulling the punch. Armed guards are fair game. Or should be."

I grimaced. "It's not their fault. They're no different to the patients. I told you, they're with us, they came into this dream along with us. And I know they're on our side, deep down. Didn't you see?"

Raine frowned with sudden curiosity. "See what?"

"None of them used their guns."

Raine's eyebrows shot upward. "Oh. Shit. Huh. I didn't even realise. Weird. Like the guns weren't even part of my thinking."

I nodded. "They could have pointed those guns at us and shouted 'freeze!', like we were in a silly crime movie or something. But they didn't. They blundered into the scenery and made a show of screwing up. I think that was on purpose! I don't think they're fair game, not at all. Well, okay, I know this principle probably can't be applied to real armed guards and paramilitary, but it applies to them. They're not like the nursing staff and the doctors. They're not even 'just following orders'. They barely followed their orders at all back there. They messed up so we could get away."

Evelyn interrupted: "You're saying they let us escape? That pratfall stuff was on purpose?"

"Exactly."

Raine nodded along, then looked out into the mist and the trees. She sighed, almost wistful. "Wish they'd slip us a firearm. I could work magic with just one gun. One mag of bullets. Hell, I'll bluff it, do it with no bullets at all."

"You most certainly will not," Evelyn grunted. "No shows of force without the teeth to back it up."

Raine turned back with a nasty grin. "Oh yeah?"

"Yes," I agreed. "I don't think it's a good idea to bluff. Not when we're so weak. Not unless we have no other choice."

Silence descended for a long moment. Distant raindrops filled the air, falling from the leaves of the nearby trees, dripping from the rim of the plastic roof above our heads. Raine flexed her shoulders and weighed her machete in one hand. Evelyn sighed and ground her teeth. The Saye Fox wandered away, circling the edge of the concrete foundations again. The Praem Plushie stared at nothing.

Perhaps Evee was right. Perhaps I was the only one truly plugged into the dream, the only one with a pen to adjust the course of the play.

I straightened up and stretched out my aching left leg — the wound was even more stiff than before, soothed only briefly by the adrenaline of our escape.

"Right then," I said. "We need to keep going, keep moving, keep trying. Lozzie is working on the riot, and we have to hope that the hilt wakes up Sevens, somehow. And we can't just bounce from bolt hole to bolt hole. We need to stick to the plan, and find Twil. Eevee, you can talk to her, try to break her out."

Evelyn squinted at me. "What about Stout's advice?"

"What advice?"

"The thing he was saying about locating the twins."

I tutted softly. "I'm the twins, I'm pretty sure. Or one twin. Or one seventh of one twin."

Evelyn shook her head gently. "I don't think he was talking about you, Heather."

"Mmmmm." I sucked on my teeth, tugging my yellow blanket tighter around my shoulders. "I'm not sure I agree. I think he was deeply confused. He wasn't really all there. He was tapping that nonsense rhythm on the pipes, too, had me thinking it meant something. He was trying to help, but I don't think we can trust any of his judgement."

"The tapping was mathematics," Evelyn said.

I boggled at her. Raine even turned to look as well. I said, "Evee, you can tell that?"

Evelyn snorted. "Absolutely not. Educated guess. Think about it. Wilson Stout was a mathematician. He developed some of his own hyperdimensional mathematics, probably originating from some kind of brush with the Eye. If you had your whole self right now, I bet you could have understood the pattern in that tapping. Stout was trying to communicate with some other entity which could understand the pattern, he practically told us — the twins."

Raine said, "What about those girls Twil was with?"

I sighed again. "They weren't twins. And they were just more patients. I don't think they were meaningful in that sense."

"Are we sure?" Raine pressed. "Sure as sure?"

"They didn't look the same," Evelyn grunted.

Raine shrugged. "They were both named Lily, right? They're the only thing here which could possibly count as twins. Maybe we should have another gander at them, after we've gotten Twil freed. Can't hurt to try."

Evelyn grumbled, less convinced than she'd been a moment ago. She gestured out at the rainy woods with one hand. "And how the hell are we going to catch her in all this? The patients and inmates will probably stay indoors today. We're stuck."

I stood up, as straight as I could manage with my throbbing leg. I swept my yellow blanket back from my shoulders, took a deep breath, and allowed myself a small and mischievous smile.

"I have an idea."

"Heather?" Evelyn grunted.

"Oho," Raine purred. "She's got something between her teeth. Go on, Heather."

"Let's bait her out," I said, feeling very naughty indeed. "Her and her friends, like we planned. Let's draw them all the way out here, deep into the woods. It's where Twil belongs, after all. Where better to help her remember what she really is?"

bedlam boundary – 24.16

Cygnets Asylum loomed out of the misty rain and drizzling droplets, peering through the saturated trees and shivering leaves like a rotting manor house abandoned in the heart of a swamp; the layers of enclosing woodland peeled back like disturbed grave dirt, moist and sticky with the leavings of distant thunderstorms, revealing the face of the asylum like the contours of a buried skull. A hundred empty eye sockets peered down at the drenched greenery of the lawns, the slippery wet pathways, the benches with their wooden slats gone slimy and slick. Each window was streaked with the slow accumulation of weak and watery raindrops, massing together on the glass and sliding downward like insensate tears upon the mirror of ossified eyeballs. Brick walls were darkened by the swirl of pinprick moisture, stained to blood red and tainted clay and strangled sunset, like the memory of ancient veins dried hard and crusty on the side of empty, windblown bone. The toothless mouth of the main entrance hung wide, flanked by the osseous wound of the side-door. Worms and beetles shifted and shuffled within — nurses, going about their business.

Two fresh incisors stood to attention just inside the main entrance — a pair of Knights, clad in black, clean and alive and upright amid the fleshless skull. They were visible all the way across the open lawns, as if picked out in greater clarity than the background of the nightmare play.

Very few patients choose to brave the damp and dreary weather of the rainy morning. As I crept from the tree line, pushing Evelyn's wheelchair ahead of me, and felt the oppressive weight of the hospital's vacant stare, I spotted only four other inmates abroad upon the asylum grounds. A pair of girls were walking off around the left side of the hospital buildings, huddling beneath the shelter of an umbrella as they hurried along. Another girl was peering out of the tall vault of the side-door — flanked by the watchful presence of a nurse; she was quickly encouraged back indoors. A second umbrella-shaded figure was heading off to the right, toward some other wing of the hospital, clutching folders and loose papers to her chest. She was flanked by a pair of burly nurses, also carrying umbrellas.

We, on the other hand, were not so lucky as to have acquired such fantastical and advanced technology as the lowly and humble umbrella, let alone two or three. No such luxury of equipment for renegades and revolutionaries — as Raine had put it. Those who fought an insurgency from the depths of the woods had to make do with the tools they had, or what little they could steal.

Raine's metaphors left a lot to be desired, but she had a solid point.

As I walked a slow and steady route down one of the red brick pathways, heading for the front of the hospital, surrounded by the swirl and churn of misty raindrops, I peered out from beneath the rim of a towel draped over my head and shoulders. The towel was growing damp already. Moisture kept dusting my face.

Evelyn was in much the same condition, hunched down in her wheelchair. Between her big grey dressing gown and the towel over her shoulders and hair, I couldn't see anything of her unless she turned her head — and she was concentrating much too hard for casual sightseeing. I felt like I was wheeling a lump of moist laundry toward the mouth of a skull.

Step one of a plan which already filled me with doubt.

My heart was fluttering in my chest like a caged dove, and we hadn't even reached the doors yet. I tried to keep my breathing steady, but found the air sticking in my throat. My palms were sweat-soaked and slippery on the handles of Eeve's wheelchair. My left leg ached with every step, the wound in my shin throbbing, muscles stiff and slow.

If this all went wrong and ended up fleeing, we had to trust that our backup was going to be swift and capable, because I was not.

"Stop," Evelyn said.

I halted instantly, heart pounding, lips sealed. The misty rain swirled around us on the feathery breeze. I tried not to move a muscle, eyes flicking left and right.

Had the first step failed so early? We'd barely started! Had somebody seen us? Did we need to retreat, or give Raine the signal, or—

"Heather," Evelyn murmured from down beneath her towel. Her voice was gentle and measured, easier and more relaxed than I'd ever heard before. "Take a deep breath. Hold it for the count of ten. Then let it out again, slowly."

"... E-Eevee? But—"

"Just. Do it. You agreed to follow my orders. Do as I say. Right now."

I took the prescribed deep breath, filling my lungs and counting to ten. Then I let it out, nice and slow, my inner air joining the rain in front of my face.

"Good," Evelyn murmured. "Heather, you need to relax and stay calm. You need to clear your mind and focus on the actions of your body. I can only sustain this if you stay calm and collected. Do not panic. Do not let go of the chair. Do not hesitate to do as I say."

She spoke so calmly and softly, in a way I'd never heard from Evelyn before we'd set this plan in motion. I'd never expected Eevee to be capable of such meditative serenity. If I hadn't known better, I would have said she was high on muscle relaxants or had gotten in Kimberly's supply of special tobacco. Evelyn, in my experience, was not a calm or relaxed person. She was proving me wrong.

I swallowed and took a second deep breath before speaking. "If you'd rather have Raine do this—"

"Raine has to be our backup in case something goes wrong," Evelyn said, with just a touch of her usual irritation creeping into her somnambulant tone. "You can hardly sprint to our rescue with a weapon, can you?"

"No," I said. "I don't think I could."

"Besides," Evelyn continued with a little grumble, "if Raine took your role for this caper, she would undoubtedly break our stealth to do something stupid and dangerous. That is her style, after all. You know that as well as I do. And she's no different in a dream. It has to be you, Heather. You are my arms and my legs. I am your brain and your shelter. We do this together."

"O-oh. Eevee. You didn't say any of that back when we were planning this, back in the pavilion."

"Huh," Evelyn almost chuckled. "Sometimes even I am capable of subterfuge."

That wasn't quite what I had meant — but I just cleared my throat and said, "Of course you are."

"Then we stick to the plan," she murmured. "Are you ready to continue?"

I glanced back over my shoulder at the tree line, and at the area where the woodland snaked toward the hospital on our left. Raine was hiding in those woods right now, ready to dart across the open ground to huddle in the lee of the hospital building. She was our backup, ready for violence, ready to respond to a set of pre-arranged signals. If we had to abandon our stealth, Raine would come in swinging, all cylinders firing. The Saye Fox was with her, or at least somewhere nearby, our unpredictable wild card in russet fur.

I couldn't see Raine. I decided that was a good sign, because she was sticking to the plan.

"Yes," I said. "I'm ready."

Evelyn gestured ahead with both hands, concealed inside the joined sleeves of her dressing gown. Within that sealed tube of fabric, her hands were wrapped around the Fadestone.

"Take the left-hand fork up ahead," she said. "Go in through the side entrance."

"Why the side entrance?"

Evelyn sighed. "Because the main doors don't have proper disabled access. There's no ramp. You can't get me up there."

"Oh, right. Whoops."

"No, not 'whoops'," Evelyn grunted. "Fuck this place."

"Quite right," I agreed, and on we went.

The wheels of Eeve's chair whispered across the damp brickwork pathway, turning without the slightest squeak of metal. I flexed my fingers around the handles, careful never to fully let go, lest I lose the protection of Evelyn's magic. I took deep, slow breaths, and reminded myself that we were invisible.

The nurses and the Knights inside the entranceway did not respond to the bizarre sight of two girls approaching down the pathway, one in a wheelchair, both of them draped with damp towels; the Fadestone hid us from all sight, even from memory.

Raine, somewhere away to our left, could not see us either. She was operating on pure memorised instructions, from my lips to her ears.

Before we'd left the pavilion to put our plan into action, we had tested that theory, to make sure that it would not be a load-bearing point of failure. If I delivered Raine an absolutely clear set of instructions and orders, totally independent of reference to where I was or what I was supposed to be doing, would she be capable of following those instructions, even when Evelyn and I were concealed under the mind-veil of the Fadestone?

The answer was yes. With Eevee and I 'vanished', Raine had followed her set of test orders to the letter. She had walked three times around the pavilion, tapped a bench with her machete, and barked like a dog. Even without the memory of why she was following my orders, she had stuck to them without the slightest doubt.

Raine trusted me without question, believed in my vision and my purpose without hesitation, and would do exactly as I ordered, even if she didn't recall where I was.

Which was useful for this plan, of course, but still a bit worrying. We didn't have time to address the root of that right then, let alone work through the reasons. We had to go bait Twil out into the woods, with or without her pair of Lillies. If Raine's unquestioning obedience to even my blurred memory helped, then we would use that tool too, at least for now.

Our other primary tool was no less reliable, but far more temperamental — Evelyn assured me that the Fadestone would work to cover her, the wheelchair, and myself. When we'd used it to hide from Sevens and the Governor, Evelyn had been in a state of panic and shock, so moving while operating it had presented a challenge. But like this, she was calm and prepared, so covering me with the effect was less difficult. As long as I held on.

But she did have to concentrate.

"It's working," Evelyn muttered as we eased into the shadow of the hospital. The face of the building loomed above us, eyes blind to our presence, framed by the black and wrinkled sky.

"Mm," I managed, throat tight, breath short.

"You can talk, you know," Evelyn said. "You don't have to stay totally silent. As long as you don't make me jump or jog my shoulder or say something to shock me. And don't test that last one, please."

"I would never," I whispered. "Sorry, Eevee, I just ... I'm very focused on getting you out of the rain. This can't be healthy for you."

"Huh," Evelyn laughed. "This? This is hardly worth the title of 'rain'. This is damp air. Last I checked, you're as English as me. We both grew up with a hundred times worse than this. Rainy weather is in our guts."

I sighed. "I never like that idea. That whole stereotype. 'Why are we out in the rain?'" I put on an exaggerated posh voice, the best good-girl tone I could muster. "'Because we're English, and good little islanders don't complain about the rainy weather.' Tch. Maybe we should stop going out in the rain so much. Maybe it would do us some good. Culturally. Or ... or something like that."

"I never had much chance to go out in the rain, when I was little. And I don't get much these days. I'm not exactly robust."

"I think you're robust," I said. "You're one of the most robust people I've ever met."

"That's very kind of you," Evelyn muttered. "But it's also a great big stinking lie." She forestalled any further debate on her robustity by nodding at the building ahead. We were just about to leave the pathways and cross the open area in front of the hospital. "Focus on our entrance, Heather. Go ahead, wheel me up there. Take it slow, watch for anything out of place."

"I wish Raine hadn't made that joke earlier," I hissed.

"Which one?"

"The one about watching for things out of place, about me wheeling you into a minefield. There's no minefields here!"

"Don't count your chickens until they've hatched."

"Tch," I tutted again. "The only person who would dream up a minefield is Raine. If it happens, we can blame her."

The front of Cygnet Hospital had two sets of doors. The main entrance was all modern glass and metal set in the surroundings of ornate red brick; that was the one through which Raine and I had joined the riot yesterday. The side entrance stood slightly to the left — a large pair of open double doors made of dark, sturdy wood, which looked like they belonged to a Church. They were propped permanently open, presumably so the girls could wander the grounds without using the main way in and out of the building. Both entrances led into the same large hallway, but the one for patients had a disabled access ramp, a short switch-back of featureless grey concrete with a handrail on either side.

We reached the ramp. My left leg complained at the weight of Evelyn and her chair. I ignored the pain and pushed, peering out from beneath my damp towel.

The hospital building seemed to tower over us, growing vast in my peripheral vision. Three stories, four stories, then ten, then fifty, then a hundred — a leviathan of brick and glass, a mountain in the sky.

But when I glanced up from the wheelchair, the hospital resumed its normal form, outlined against the wrinkled black surface of the Eye's underside.

I frowned at the asylum, daring it to try that again.

It did not.

Evelyn stayed absolutely calm as I pushed her up the ramp. We turned the switchback corner and faced the double-doors. Two Knights were visible just inside, looming among the shadows of the entrance hallway, flanking our only way in.

“Just keep moving,” Evelyn murmured. “They cannot see us. Ignore them. Take deep breaths. Ignore them, they cannot see us. Ignore them. Ignore them. They cannot see us. Ignore them.”

Evelyn kept up her improvised mantra, but my nerves almost couldn't take the tension. My heart raced against my ribs as I walked the last few paces. Cold sweat broke out down my back and on my face as I passed beneath the shelter of the door. A flush of adrenaline — burning hot and pounding in my head — rushed into my veins as I passed between the twin sentinels of the Knights on guard duty.

The Knights didn't react. They didn't even glance down at us. They ignored us completely.

I paused right between them, wiping my slippers on the doormat, then carried on, home free.

Evelyn and I were swallowed up by the vastness of Cygnet Asylum's entrance hall. Wet wheelchair tires squeaked on the tiled floor. The rain swirled at our backs, left behind outdoors. A wall of warm air tickled my face, pumped from a dozen radiators deeper inside the building.

"Stop," Evelyn said softly.

I halted just beyond the Knights. I probably would have done so even without Evelyn's orders.

The entrance hallway looked much the same as my previous visits to this part of the asylum — a large airy open space with a high ceiling, from which several corridors wormed off into the depths of the hospital. To our right was the reception desk, walled off by glass dividers. Beyond that, in the corner of the room, was the metal door through which we had passed in order to save Evelyn yesterday. On our left were the pair of archways which led to the mess hall and the main dayroom.

Evidence of yesterday's riot was everywhere; the staff had cleared up the worst of the mess, of course — picked up the pots and pans, cleared away the broken glass from around the reception desk, and mopped the blood off the floor. But several areas of floor tiles were still stained with red shadows; those would take more than elbow grease and bleach to scrub clean. The area in front of the mess hall was covered in scratches and dents — the aftermath of the avalanche of pots and pans. Several patches of wall were scuffed or scraped. A huge chunk of plaster was missing from one corner, as if gouged out by a set of claws or the head of a mace. One of the glass wall sections behind the reception desk was simply gone, missing like a shattered tooth with the stump yanked from the socket. The reception desk itself was empty — no nurses on duty, no computer or phone on the desk, no chair or stool behind. Normal functions had been suspended during this state of emergency.

Nurses and Knights were everywhere. Each corridor and archway was flanked by at least one Knight, more often two, hands loose and lazy on their submachine guns strapped over their chests. Nurses hurried back and forth on their tasks, always moving in pairs or trios. Some of them looked haggard and worn out, drawn tight by insomnia and stress. Some had visible bruises on their faces, hands, or forearms. A few carried weapons — nightsticks and short clubs, wrapped in fabric or foam, nothing bladed or sharp.

Not a single nurse or Knight looked our way. A pair of nurses walked right toward us — then swerved around Eeve's wheelchair, as if they could sense us despite their conscious minds refusing to acknowledge our presence.

I felt like a beetle inside an anthill, coated in looted pheromone, unseen by the swarming automatons all around.

"Mm," Evelyn purred. "Security's heightened."

"My thoughts exactly," I said with a strangled sigh. "I'm trying to stay calm, but we are surrounded on all sides. I don't like this."

"If you want to retreat, we retreat."

"But— Eeve, you said to follow your orders for this."

"It's your plan, Heather. If you doubt it's feasible, or you think it's not doable anymore, then we turn back and rethink. You follow my orders for execution, but the executive decision is up to you. Do we go back, or push on?"

"You trust me to—"

"I trust you absolutely. Make the call."

I took another one of those nice slow deep breaths, and counted to ten. Evelyn waited.

Truth was, I didn't know.

Abyssal instinct — the gut-feeling which had guided me through so many dangerous and difficult situations, though sometimes with unintended side-effects — was silent. My decision making was impaired, missing six sevenths of myself. In a very real way, I was suffering a traumatic brain injury, though I still had all the grey matter inside my skull, untouched and undamaged. I felt like nothing more special than a scared young woman surrounded by threats. I let my attention linger on the Knights, then on the nurses. My eyes wandered over the subdued light of the entrance hall, illumination muted by the rain outdoors. I listened to the clack of shoes on the tessellated wooden tiles of the entrance hall floor.

And then I frowned.

“Wait a moment,” I murmured. “Wasn’t this floor made of lino, earlier?”

“Mm?” Evelyn grunted. “Heather?”

“Nothing, nothing,” I said. Had the dream changed, or were my memories incomplete?

The dream had changed, of course — the asylum had increased its security.

But it still couldn’t see us.

I made my decision. “It’s still doable. These differences change nothing.”

“Alright. Keep your hands on the wheelchair,” Evelyn murmured — though I could hear the slight tremor in her voice. She swallowed before she continued. “That’s all you have to do, Heather. Follow my instructions. Keep one hand on the wheelchair, but get these bloody damp towels off our heads.”

“Right, right.” I did as Evelyn requested; I kept my left hand tight on the wheelchair handle as I gently lowered the towel from over her head, smoothing out her mass of blonde hair. Then I did the same for myself, settling the makeshift rain-guard across my shoulders. My yellow blanket had kept the rest of my body mostly dry; I wished I could give it to Evee, but I had no idea what would happen to my position in the dream if I took it off. Perhaps the blanket was the only thing anchoring us to Sevens-as-Director.

Evelyn took a deep breath and straightened up in her chair.

“Alright, Heather. Dayroom first. Let’s hope our assumptions were correct.”

“Dayroom first,” I echoed, and set off across the entrance hall, pushing Evelyn ahead of me.

Nurses wheeled and dodged around us as we walked, their eyes often glancing over us without truly seeing. It felt like crossing a busy road by walking straight ahead, praying that none of the cars would plough right into us. The archway to the dayroom yawned wide, flickering with soft blue light and the distant murmur of voices on television. The Knight to the right of the door seemed to glance at us briefly, eyes hidden by the helmet visor. But then the Knight looked away again.

The wheels of Evee's chair sank into the soft white carpet on the dayroom floor. My footsteps vanished, soaked up by the plush fabric.

Cygnets Asylum's main dayroom appeared to have been spared the worst of yesterday's riot. None of the many televisions were broken; more of them were switched on than yesterday morning, casting a cold blue glow over the white carpet, ghosting across the armchairs and sofas, draining the colour from the faces of their audience. None of the bookshelves had been overturned or ransacked, though I spotted a few places where the books themselves had been taken, seemingly without any collateral damage. The various board games on some of the tables had not been disturbed either; perhaps the patients had a special respect for those. I spotted Evelyn's game — the one with the little tokens of tanks and infantry and military symbols. It was exactly where she'd left it, spread out on a table close to the massive window which looked out across the grounds.

The only obvious casualty of the riot was one of the computers in the far corner. One of the row of desks was empty, the computer had been stolen, screen and tower both spirited away, along with cables and keyboard and mouse and all.

One addition had appeared in the dayroom — a whiteboard was standing toward the rear of the space, in front of the long, low counter top which supported the terrariums and animal cages. I couldn't read the text from the entrance.

"Lots of nurses," Evelyn hissed. "Damn. They're not taking any chances with another uprising."

"Yes ... that's a ... well, it's to be expected."

"Pity."

Groups of patients sat in quiet huddles, dotted about the room on the sofas and armchairs. Every group of girls was accompanied by a nurse.

Some of the nurses sat apart from the girls they were assigned to watch, aloof and distant. Others stood tall, arms folded and eyes narrowed. Many of them sat among the girls themselves, chattering along, trying to be friendly, watching television alongside the inmates they were keeping an eye on. Others still were napping, nodding off in their chairs. A few were playing board games or cards with the patients, alternately grumpy and irritated or open-faced and bright.

The girls were subdued and sedated and stubbornly sullen. Murmurs of conversation broke out in hushed voices, then dribbled away to nothing. Some of the patients cast sidelong glances at their unwanted chaperones. Others kept careful arms around less confident girls, as if the nurses were wolves stalking through a vulnerable flock. Most girls just stared at the flickering televisions, saying nothing, unsmiling as they watched brightly coloured morning cartoons.

Were these the 'good girls' who had not participated in the riot? Or were these the troublemakers, now kept under close and watchful eyes?

"There," Evelyn whispered, nodding toward the huge window on the left. "That's her, right?"

Twil and her pair of Lillies were sitting on a sofa just in front of the huge window, their heads framed by the misty rain and dark green lawns outdoors. Twil was sat between Lily One and Lily Two. They appeared to be playing some sort of board game on a wide table.

A very familiar nurse was sitting opposite them, her back toward us, apparently joining in with the game.

"Yes, that's Twil," I whispered.

"Tch," Evelyn tutted with open disgust. "She looks like a parody of herself."

"Mm. And that nurse, I think that's ... 'Horror'."

"Eh?"

"Horror, it's on her name tag. The nurse who took you away yesterday, and confronted us after we freed you. She keeps cropping up every time I try to make a move."

Evelyn squinted. "I thought the King in Yellow killed her."

I shook my head. "I don't think she can be killed. I think she's some kind of main avatar or representative of the asylum itself."

"Huh," Evelyn grunted. "Maybe we should bait her out to the woods instead, have Raine cut off her head. See if she can come back from that.”

I winced. “Not that I’m feeling merciful toward her, but I doubt that would work. Shall we head over there?”

“Not yet,” Evelyn replied. She nodded toward the rear of the room, where the cages and terrariums waited, with the message written on the whiteboard. “Take me over there, I want to see what it says. But keep an eye on Twil, just in case she moves.”

We crossed the razor tension of the dayroom at a walk. I examined the slack, bored, distant faces of the patients we passed.

A few of them were making small talk, but fewer still dared smile. I sighed in despair — we had failed these people, failed to free them, despite all of Lozzie’s hard work. Now they were beaten down and defeated, without much energy left, watched by a panopticon of nurses.

But then, as I observed from within the invisibility of the Fadestone, I began to spot scraps of paper being passed hand-to-hand, slipping from furtive fingers to soft palms — secret messages, circulating whenever the nurses weren’t looking. I noticed heads leaning on shoulders while girls pretended to watch television together, fingers tapping code on other’s thighs, squeezing silent replies against close-snuggled hips. I noticed meaningful glances cast across the room, winks and squints and tongues poking at the corners of mouths; isolated groups were communicating with each other, below the notice of the nurses.

“Oh my gosh,” I whispered. “Evee, are you seeing this? They’re still going, they’re still rebelling!”

“Ha,” Evelyn laughed, soft and gentle. “I certainly am. Lozzie’s work, I’m guessing.”

“Probably!”

“Wonder where she took them.”

“Yes, I— sorry, pardon?”

I halted Evee’s wheelchair just shy of the whiteboard, then realised she was talking about the message written in block capitals.

‘THE CATERPILLARS ARE VERY SENSITIVE CREATURES AND CANNOT SURVIVE FOR LONG OUTSIDE OF THEIR TERRARIUM. IF

ANY PATIENT HAS INFORMATION ON WHO TOOK THEM OR WHERE THEY HAVE BEEN TAKEN, PLEASE COME FORWARD TO THE NURSING STAFF. YOU WILL NOT BE PUNISHED FOR PROVIDING INFORMATION. IF YOU KNOW THE CULPRIT AND HAVE KEPT THIS SECRET, COME FORWARD AND YOU WILL NOT BE PUNISHED.'

I peered around the sign; the big glass tank which had held the shrunken Caterpillars was completely empty.

"Oh!" I breathed in delight. "Oh, thank heavens for that. It horrified me seeing them in there."

"Like I said," Evelyn muttered. "Lozzie, freeing her creations. Good on her. We're all working toward the same end, bringing this place down and freeing everyone and everything within." Evelyn clucked her tongue. "Though I have no idea what kind of wild card factor they could introduce."

"It would be lovely if they got large again," I said. "An instant win for us."

"Mm, they could just shout the place into rubble," Evelyn muttered. "Though I doubt they've managed to grow yet, I think we'd know about that. We need to contact Lozzie again, as soon as we have a chance. Right, mystery solved. Heather, wheel us over to Twil."

"Part two of the plan, here we go," I whispered, trying to stay nice and calm.

I approached the rear window and Twil's trio via a circuitous route, winding in and out of the sofas and armchairs and little tables and televisions, so as to avoid drawing near to any nurses — which was almost impossible, since every group of girls was accompanied by at least one white-clad member of staff. Several nurses looked up at us as we passed by, their eyes sliding off Evelyn and I as if we were not there, warded away by the power of the Fadestone. A few of the patients looked our way as well, though with less regularity; most of the girls in the dayroom were either entranced by the television shows or focused on slipping messages and nods and even hand signals below the notice of the ever-present nurses.

Eventually we emerged from the tangle of seating, with no further obstacles between us and Twil's group.

Twil and her pair of Lillies had not changed since the previous day.

Twil herself was still barely recognisable — straightened hair, bottle-thick glasses, her usual toned athleticism swapped out for the reedy, delicate physique of a bad romance novel protagonist, designed for the sole purpose of being swept off her feet or pressed against a wall, overwhelmed by taller, bolder, older girls.

The Lillies were sitting either side of her, their backsides dimpling the uncomfortable grey sofa. The waspish blonde was on Twil's left; the redhead tomboy with the freckles was to Twil's right. I couldn't recall which was which — one of them was 'Lilly' and the other was 'Lilii'. Internally I dubbed the blonde Lily One and the redhead Lily Two. I could apologise to them later, if this ever came up. This was a military operation, one of Raine's 'sneaking missions', so there was no margin for messing up my Lillies.

All three of them were dressed in those matching grey school uniforms, with ties and blazers and unflattering skirts. All three wore much darker tights than yesterday. A concession to the cold and rainy weather, perhaps?

Lily One and Lily Two were both leaning forward over the table, dominating the space.

Lily One was twirling a lock of platinum blonde hair about one finger, elbows on the table, tresses trailing down and pooling on the corner of the game board. She was chattering away about some minor point of the rules, putting on an easy-going, giggly tone.

“—and if you take two moves in a row after using the mind control token, you have to sacrifice one of your size three monsters, and you only have one left on the board right now. It's soooo silly, but them's the rules, you know? We can't go easy on you because you're such a lovely nurse, you know? Right? That would be like, reverse cheating! Hahaha! Don't blame me, blame the game!”

Lily Two was sitting with her legs crossed and stuck out to one side, sprawled across the opposite corner of the table as if intentionally taking up as much space as possible. Her short red hair cupped her head like a flared helmet. Her eyes looked unimpressed. She ran her tongue over her teeth, behind her lips.

Twil was sunken down between the pair, sitting straight-backed against the sofa, hands folded neatly in her lap, amber eyes peering through the thick lenses of her ridiculous glasses.

“Tch!” Evelyn hissed in open disgust.

“Evee?” I whispered.

“Look at them, boxing her in like that. I know you said it was bad, but I didn’t realise it was this bad. They have her pinned, psychologically. If you painted that set of poses, it would be too cliché for belief. She’s—”

“No,” I whispered, amazed at what I was seeing. “Evee, look closer. Really look.”

The trio were all sat on one side of the table; on the other side, playing the opposing force in their board game, was Horror — comfortably plush, young, straight-backed, and very blonde, hair pinned up behind her head in a loose bun.

She was listening to Lily One’s explanation with an indulgent smile. One of her hands was toying with a piece from the board game — a little grey plastic castle. She nodded along as Lily One rattled on, with the look of an adult humouring a child about some juvenile flight of fancy.

Her left arm was strapped across her front, immobilised inside a medical sling.

“What?” Evelyn hissed. “The nurse? At least she bugged up her wrist punching out the King in Yellow.” Evelyn sighed. “Now there’s a sentence I wish I’d never had cause to say.”

“No, Evee, look at them. Really look at them. What are they doing? What are the Lillies doing?”

Evelyn went silent. I couldn’t see her face without leaning forward and risking letting go of the handles, but I could picture her squinty frown.

“Explain,” she hissed.

“They’re not boxing Twil in,” I whispered. “They’re protecting Twil from Horror. They’re covering her flanks. Horror can’t reach her.”

I expected Evelyn to snort. I had no evidence for this theory except the rumblings of my own compromised gut instinct. But Evelyn just sighed. “Perhaps. But why? Who are these two, aren’t they just more dream-actor patients?”

“Maybe they’re more than that.”

Evelyn clucked her tongue. “We can speculate later. Wheel us close, about two feet out from the table. Let’s see if you were right about our target.”

I nodded, though Evelyn couldn’t see me. We crossed the last fifteen feet to Twil’s table. The huge rear window loomed wide as we approached, rain swirling against the glass, hazy droplets fogging the view beyond. If we had timed this right, Raine was on the other side of that wall, hunkered down below the level of the window, just out of sight. Our emergency back up.

As we approached, Lily One stopped talking and Horror looked around, as if they could both see us. I kept moving, though my hands were slick with sweat and my legs were shaking. Horror’s eyes lingered for a second, then slid away. She turned back to Twil and the Lillies. I halted Evelyn’s wheelchair alongside the table, with a good safe two feet between us and the edge.

“Well!” Horror said to the grey-clad trio of schoolgirl cosplayers. “Be that as it may, I think this game is almost over. You girls have put up a very good fight, especially for so early in the morning. I’m very impressed. I am, really!” Horror nodded, smiling brightly. Then she clacked her little plastic castle down on the game board. “But I’m two moves from victory. I’ve got you whittled down, cut off, and surrounded. Hmhm!”

Lily One tutted and rolled her eyes — she was smiling with all the toxic insincerity of a queen bee about to lose her temper, doing her best to conceal the raging torrent beneath her face. She swept her long blonde hair back, smiling like a snake. “Don’t be so sure, Miss,” she drawled. “You never know, we could have a trick up our collective selves. I mean, sleeves. Collective sleeves. You know what I mean.”

“Uh huh,” grunted Lily Two. She was staring, level and cold, like a thug loitering outside a Mafia-owned bakery, tapping her fingertips on the table in a slow and steady rhythm. “Tricks and traps and nasty trips. You know us, nurse.”

Horror let out a warm, bubbly chuckle. She inclined her head as if extending courtesy to an already vanquished foe, tucking one lock of blonde hair behind an ear with her uninjured hand.

“Weeeeeeeell,” she said, with the tone of a particularly indulgent preschool teacher. “What does your leader say to that? Got anything left in your arsenal, Twillamina?”

Horror turned to Twil.

Lily One clamped her lips shut, visibly bristling. Lily Two narrowed her eyes at Horror; her fingers ceased their tapping.

Twil smiled, innocent and clueless, beaming beneath her huge round glasses. “I’m not sure, Doctor,” she said in that too-high, ultra-girlish tone, so unlike her real self. “I’m not really that familiar with the game. This is the first time I’ve played, after all. Maybe if we have a rematch, I could learn more?”

Horror sighed, smiling and tilting her head, as if speaking with a patient who was too far gone to understand how to dress herself. “Oh, bless you, dear. How many times must I tell you, Twillamina? I’m not a Doctor, I’m just a nurse. It’s alright to use my name, really, I promise. I won’t get angry or grumpy about that.”

Lily One cleared her throat. She spoke with false lightness, all sunshine and smile. “Actually, I think respect for one’s elders is very important.”

Horror laughed, bright and bouncy. “Tch, you! Don’t be silly. I’m barely ten years your senior. Some of the other nurses are old enough to be your grandmothers. But not me.”

Lily Two added, low and soft: “Important to show respect for the authority invested in Cygnet Staff too, you know?”

Horror sighed with significantly less patience, her bright smile dimming. “Alright, alright, you two, if you insist. But you can hardly call me ‘nurse’, there’s just so many nurses here that—”

“We’ll muddle through,” said Lily One. “Nurse.”

“Yes, Nurse,” said Lily Two. “You’d be surprised.”

Twil looked rather lost, eyes darting left and right behind her glasses, mouth open as if confused by the reaction from her bodyguards and lovers. I realised with mounting concern that she did not comprehend the position she was in, nor how hard her companions were fighting to protect her.

But protect her from what?

Horror endured the veiled insults with a beatific smile, then returned her attention to Twil. “So, Twillamina. Back to the game.

Do you have anything left in your box of tricks? Go ahead, if you do. I'm ready for it."

Twil bit her lower lip and peered at the board game.

The game itself was impenetrable to me — the board appeared to represent the streets and major locations of a fictional town, studded with little plastic monsters, important landmarks, and towering castles which had burst from the rock beneath the streets. A reserve of monsters great and small were gathered in front of Horror. Her remaining troops, I assumed. Little player tokens showed Twil's dwindling forces — gumshoe detectives with little plastic revolvers, mostly, their ranks bolstered by an occasional helmeted soldier or mobsters armed with stereotypical Tommy guns. Their numbers were few, most of them appeared to have been killed by the monsters or removed to a special box on the board labelled 'Outside', which caught my attention. The remaining player tokens were scattered all over the town, hopelessly cut off from each other, fighting individual battles against the plastic monsters.

On the table directly in front of Twil was a little plastic box with a hinged lid, raised so that Horror couldn't see the contents, but Twil and her companions could — and so could I, from my angle beside the table.

The box was almost empty. Only one piece remained within — a little plastic figure of a cone snail, peeking out from inside its shelled protection.

Twil reached for the piece, but then Lily One grabbed Twil's hand. "Ah ah ah!" She laughed and smiled, but I could see the tension crinkling around her eyes. "Twillamina, don't be so fast. Don't give anything away, right? For all she knows, we have a dozen moves left. Or none at all!"

Twil leaned back. "R-right. Right. Of course. Be smart, yes."

Horror sighed. "It is your move, you three. And we can't sit here all day, can we?"

Evelyn hissed to me: "Heather, does she have the book? I can't see from down here in the chair. It's not in Twil's lap."

"Ummm," I murmured. "Yes, yes, she does. It's by her side, down on the sofa."

Our target was within reach; propped against Twil's left hip, front cover facing outward, was the heavy hardback book which I'd seen her carrying yesterday morning, and which she'd been reading from when we'd interrupted her little picnic with her 'lovers'. The words we'd overheard yesterday had sounded quasi-religious, as if the tome was a holy book of some kind. She'd clung to the thing, pressed it over her chest like a shield when threatened, and then dropped it when she'd almost been goaded into her werewolf transformation. I hadn't gotten a good look at the cover before, but now I could see it clearly: there was no title or author, just leather cut and shaped into a raised illustration. The design showed a trio of feminine figures locked in an embrace — two were dryads, unearthly and fairy-like, wrapped in mantles and veils of leaf and blossom, while the figure in the middle was clearly meant to be a werewolf, trapped and protected by a cage of roots.

"Oh, you're joking," I whispered as I squinted at the book. "Can you get any more obvious?"

"Heather?" Evelyn hissed. "What do you mean?"

"The cover of the book, it's a metaphor for Twil. You'll understand when you see it, but ... "

Lily One and Lily Two were sharing a difficult glance. Horror just smiled, so soft and serene. Twil cleared her throat gently, but the tension refused to break. She pressed her hands tightly together in her own lap.

Evelyn hissed through her teeth: "Can you reach the book? Whatever you do, don't let go of the wheelchair handles completely. Wheel me closer if you have to, they won't be able to see us. Just don't touch any of them, especially the fucking nurse ... Heather?"

"Now, girls," Horror was saying, with a tone of forced reason and patience in the face of foolish dreams. "I said we can't sit here all day, but that's not strictly true." She gestured at the window and the rain-streaked glass. "Nobody's going outdoors in that, I think. If you need time to consider your move, I can come back after my rounds. I'd hate to leave the game unfinished, after all."

Twil started to say, "We can finish right—"

Lily One grabbed Twil's knee. "Maybe give us time to confer, yeah, nurse. Right. Great idea.”

Lily Two sat up a bit straighter, easing out of her slouch. “Yeah, like, think it over. Think about the implications. Consider what comes next.”

Horror’s eyes twinkled. “But you’ve only got one move. Do I have to force you into taking it? That’s not very sporting, is it?”

Evelyn half-twisted in her wheelchair, frowning at me over her shoulder. “Heather, we’re going to lose our window. Grab the book.”

I shook my head. “No. No, we have to change the plan.”

Evelyn opened her mouth to argue — then stopped and nodded. “You’re in charge. Just stay calm and move slowly. Tell me what you’re going to do before you do it.”

I nodded. “Okay. Um ... the book, well ... ”

Our plan was not yet in tatters, but it was probably no longer viable — because a second, unexpected force had already closed on our ultimate aim. Horror was pressing Twil’s trio for something we did not yet comprehend.

The institution — Cygnet Asylum, the dream, the play — was trying to access Twil, trying to defeat her bodyguards.

The original plan was both simple and crude. Step one: get close to Twil while under the protection of the Fadestone. Step two: snatch the ‘holy book’ from under her nose. Step three: Evelyn and I would transport the book away from Twil and her bodyguards, while watching to see if Twil began to panic. Step four: when we were at a safe distance, we would intentionally show ourselves to Twil or her lovers, revealing that we had taken her book, thus beginning the wild goose chase — either Evelyn and I could do it ourselves by vanishing again, or Raine would take over that role, being faster on her feet. The idea was to bait Twil and the Lillies without exposing ourselves to the entire asylum and the staff, leading the trio deep into the woods. Even one of them alone would do. As long as we could start a chain reaction.

The whole plan might take several hours. We needed multiple openings for it to work. Stealing the book itself was just the start.

But now Horror had Twil cornered, and Twil didn’t even seem to understand that she was fighting with her back to a wall, her 'lovers' at her shoulders. The Lillies got it, but Twil was still too deep in the dream.

"Horror has Twil cornered," I whispered to Evee. "I don't understand how, but we need to get her out of here. We need to bail her out. We can't have Twil get taken away. Not like you were."

Evee's eyes widened as she finally understood what I was getting at. She glanced at the board game, then at Horror's innocent smile, then at the increasingly tense looks on the faces of Twil's Lillies.

"Shit," Evelyn hissed.

"One move," said Lily Two. She sat up and rolled her shoulders back, then smoothed her hair with a hand.

I recognised that pose, that tightening of the muscles.

Lily One nodded, rolling her head from side to side. She pushed up the sleeves of her neat grey blazer.

They were preparing for violence. Against the nurses, against Horror! They would never win, they'd never even get out of the dayroom. There were dozens of nurses within sight, and more within earshot. Knights would come running as well. The whole place was teetering on the edge of more violence, and these two were willing to throw down to protect Twil from consequences I didn't even yet understand.

"I—I need suggestions, Evee," I hissed, trying to stay calm and collected; I couldn't risk breaking the cover of the Fadestone. "And quickly. We need a way to—"

"Mess up the game."

"Ah?"

"Mess up the game!" Evelyn repeated. "God, I'll do it! Wheel me closer, quickly!"

I did as Evelyn requested; I wheeled her right up to the edge of the table, so she was barely a foot from Horror on one side and Lily Two on the other.

Evelyn ignored them both. She took one hand off the Fadestone, yanked back the sleeve of her grey dressing gown, and reached onto the game board.

She scooped up pieces and tokens, dropping some of them into her lap, placing others back down in new board positions. She rearranged the formation of Twil's embattled soldiers and detectives, rescuing dozens of them from the 'Outside' box, placing them at choke points and stuffing them into the illustrations of sturdy buildings. Within seconds she had Twil's plastic army occupying a newspaper office and a canning factory, the streets outside stuffed with barricades and sandbags.

I knew nothing about tactics and strategy, but even I could see that position was much more defensible.

All four people at the table watched Evelyn's changes as she worked to re-order Twil's forces. Twil herself, the Lillies, and Horror, they all stared at the moving pieces as if this was entirely natural, as if some exterior force was not reaching into the visible world and making mysterious changes to the game they had been playing.

I stayed very still, trying not to let my skin crawl; they could see us, but they also couldn't. The feeling was bizarre and unwelcome, like I was only partially real.

After shoring up Twil's board position, Evelyn started thinning out the ranks of Horror's monsters, plucking them off the board and placing them into reserve. Once she had scattered their hordes and broken up their assaults, she picked up a particularly large piece — a floating eyeball on a cluster of jellyfish-esque stalks, and went to drop it into her lap.

"Evee!" I hissed.

"Heather, don't break my— ah."

Evelyn froze.

Horror was looking right at us.

She could not see us, could not see our faces or acknowledge our presence. She was calm and breezy, as if doing nothing more than glancing to one side. But she stared and stared and stared.

"She doesn't want to let that piece go," I hissed — then hiccuped, painfully. "Hic. Ow. Evee, don't. Just put it back on the board or—"

"Better," Evelyn whispered. She reached forward and waved the eyeball-piece in front of Horror's face. Horror tracked it back and forth; I wanted to scream. Evee whispered to her: "You want this? You need this one to win, huh? Okay."

Then Evelyn turned and pressed the piece into my hand.

"Evee?! Wha-what—"

"Throw it. Now. As far as you can. Toward the back of the room. Now!"

With no time to think, and certainly none to argue — for Horror's eyes were sliding toward me and the bait in my hand — I turned aside and hurled the little plastic playing piece across the room. It sailed with all the aerodynamics of a piece of lead shot, and landed with a tiny click-click-clatter among the animal cages at the rear of the room.

Evelyn sat back from her meddling.

Horror turned toward where the piece had fallen and let out a soft tut. "Oh dear, I think I must have dropped one of the more fiddly pieces. Excuse me for a moment, girls, I'll be right back. Don't go anywhere now!"

Horror got up and hurried off toward the rear of the dayroom, to retrieve the fallen piece. Lily One and Lily Two shared a look, while Twil was still watching Horror depart. Lily One drew a fingertip across her own neck, then thumbed at Horror's retreating back. Lily Two nodded in acknowledgement.

Evelyn huffed. "These two are as bad as Raine. For fuck's sake, get out of here, all three of you. Go on!"

But Twil just leaned forward and examined the new board position, smiling beneath her glasses, amber eyes twinkling in delight.

"Am I a strategic genius?" she said. "Look at all this! I didn't think I'd be any good at this game, it's an unsuitable pursuit for a young lady. But I've done really well."

Evelyn ground her teeth. "Yes, please, take credit for my intellect. 'Unsuitable pursuit for a young lady' my arse. Fuck. Heather, grab the book, before I cuff her over the head."

"But—"

"Wait!" Evelyn held up a hand. "Actually that wouldn't be enough.

Change of plan. We need to get Twil to follow us, right now.”

“But how—”

“Be ready to run!” Evelyn announced.

She leaned forward again, halfway across the board game. She reached out with one hand, her maimed hand, toward Twil — and cupped Twil’s cheek.

Twil’s eyes snapped upward, locking with Eeve’s gaze. Her mouth opened in a little ‘oh’ of silent shock.

“Remember me, bitch?” Evelyn grunted.

“What— I— where did you—” Twil stammered and stuttered.

“You should do, because you once knew what my cunt tastes like. Now, do try to keep up.”

Evelyn yanked Twil’s glasses off Twil’s face. Twil sat back, spluttering with confusion, glancing left and right, no longer able to see us now she was not in contact with the Fadestone. She blinked rapidly, blinded by the blurred world without her glasses. “My— my glasses!” she spluttered. “Where— who took my—”

The Lillies turned toward Twil. Twil looked like she was on the verge of a scream.

Evelyn raised the stolen glasses into the air. “Heather, grab the book. If this doesn’t make them move, nothing will. Grab that tome and wheel me the hell out of here, before we all get sucked into Twil’s lesbian boarding-school fantasy.”

bedlam boundary – 24.17

Evelyn and I had almost escaped the dayroom when Twil's mounting panic touched flailing flame to hidden fuse.

Twil's mysterious tome — her leatherbound 'holy book', the cover illustrated with an unsubtle metaphor about caged werewolves — was now tucked into the crook of Evelyn's arm, so Eevee could keep both hands on the Fadestone as we made our getaway. My fingers tingled from where I'd touched the leather cover of the book, as if I'd plunged my hand into a pot of spiced honey; I had snatched it off the sofa and whisked it away from Twil's slender hips, leaving her none the wiser. I would dearly love to claim that I had accomplished the manoeuvre in one swift motion, with steady hands and stilled breath, but that would be a pitiful lie, because I've never had stable nerves at the best of times, let alone when trying to steal a reasonably heavy object while rendered invisible by unreliable magic, in the middle of a crowded room, on a time limit.

But I'd done it, somehow, feeling like my body was hooked up to an electric wall socket. Twil hadn't noticed the book's absence as we'd turned and scurried away, still too preoccupied by the fact her glasses had vanished from off her own face — and still flushed beetroot red by Evelyn's rather choice words about Twil's carnal knowledge. Even if Twil couldn't recall who had said the words, the emotional impact lingered beyond the Fadestone's cover.

The tingling in my fingers wasn't supernatural, it was just jitters, the nerve-impact of a successful raid. My heels were spring-loaded, my shoulder blades were painted with a glowing target, and my heart was trying to squirm up my windpipe.

But a mad smile jerked onto my lips, coupled with a hitching little laugh and a double hic-hic of unwelcome hiccups. We'd done it! We'd stolen the book, and Twil's glasses as a bonus!

Was this what it felt like to pull off a madcap heist? I suddenly felt like a very, very bad girl indeed. And I rather liked that feeling.

We hurried away through the tangle of dayroom sofas and armchairs and televisions, skirting groups of stirring patients, attempting to avoid the occasional nurse roused by the commotion we'd caused.

Twil's panic was drawing too much attention.

"My glasses! My glasses, they were right on my face! Right here! I can't find them, they're not— they're not in my pockets! Oh, you two, this isn't funny, this isn't funny!"

Twil's two Lillies attempted to soothe her, but they were just as confused as our dreaming werewolf. Their voices chased my heels as I wheeled Evee toward the archway and the exit.

"Did you drop them? Are they under the sofa?"

"Twillamina, breathe, take a deep breath, that's it, come on sweetheart. Take a deep breath. You just left them somewhere, that's all. It's nothing, it's nothing, nothing happened! Hey, heeeeeeey, relax, relax—"

"Maybe they got mixed up with the game pieces? Here, let's take a look, come on."

"Let me check your pockets for you, baby, you probably just got confused."

Evelyn hissed through clenched teeth, half in derision, half with savage satisfaction. "Those two are no smarter than Twil herself. Come on, you pair of old tramps, think harder. Use your brains."

"I really don't think we should taunt them!" I whispered, skirting another occupied sofa as the patients started to sit up and turn around and crane their necks to get a look at the unfolding drama.

"Rubbish," Evelyn murmured. "It's not as if they can hear us." She half-twisted in the wheelchair, trying to look past me, to look back at our as-yet unbaited catch. "Whatever. They'll figure it out eventually, and if they don't, we can bait them again. The first step is over and I've bought them time, with that stupid board game. Get us out of here, Heather, get us back out—"

"My book!"

Twil's shriek cut through the taut tension of the dayroom like shears slicing apart a set of violin strings.

A full-body shiver propelled me forward as if the werewolf herself was at my heels. Evelyn flinched and blinked and turned back around, hands firmly on the Fadestone, whispering a sudden mantra to shore up our bubble of invisibility. “We are not here. We are not here. We are not here.”

“It’s gone!” Twil wailed. “It’s gone! It was right here, right here! You both know I never let it out of my sight, I would never drop it! I would never even turn away from it, not for a second! And— and it- no, no! It was right here!”

All across the dayroom girls rose from their seats or twisted on the sofas or sat up straighter, all eyes turning toward Twil and her Lillies. A ripple of motion and bobbing heads and bright-eyed attention passed over the crowd like the echo of a stone dropped into dark water.

Some patients called out rapid questions — “Hey, what’s wrong? Hey, what’s wrong with Twilla? Hey?”, “What did you lose, lassie?”, “Bet a fucking nurse stole it!” — while others darted covert glances across the length of the dayroom, making furtive eye contact with distant conspirators. A few girls slipped objects into their Cygnet-issue pajama bottoms, palming secret notes, tucking away hidden tools. Fewer still used the sudden distraction to carry out actions behind the backs of the nurses; some pulled silly faces or stuck out their tongues to shore up the morale of their nearby friends, but others snatched things off tables or rifled through briefly unguarded bags, pocketing access fobs and ID cards and bottles of pills. One brave and light-fingered patient openly pick-pocketed a nurse, sliding a bunch of keys from a uniform pocket and stuffing it up inside her own shirt.

Perhaps this was the opening they’d all been waiting for.

The nursing staff shot to their collective feet in a flash, but they lagged behind the patients and inmates by a vital few seconds; the eyes and hands of the panopticon could not, in fact, see everywhere all at once and touch every corner of every life. They had not seen this coming. They could not see the instigators — Evelyn and me. All they could do now was shout and bawl.

“Girls, girls, settle down! Settle back down!”

“Pay no attention! Carry on with what you were doing! Eyes forward, that means all of you! Anna, Marta, I see you both trying your luck there, sit back down!”

“No rubbernecking, it’s very rude. Isn’t it? You wouldn’t like it if your misfortune was on display for everyone to see. Come on, there’s nothing to see there, nothing to see. Don’t pay any attention, girls, please.”

Evee and I were almost to the archway when I made the mistake of looking back.

Horror — my medical adversary, my dream-bound antagonist, the one nurse who kept coming back again and again — was crossing the dayroom, returning to Twil’s table. She held the game piece which I’d hurled across the room, cupped in one soft hand. Her eyes were narrowed at Twil and the Lillies, lips pursed with impatience, shoulders and chin set. She carried the pose of an adult who planned to separate naughty children from each other. Perhaps she smelled a rat.

Twil and her Lillies were not in a good state. Twil herself was heaving for breath, tears running down her cheeks, face twisted with terrible distress. She was gripping the side of Lily One’s grey uniform blazer, like a lost child clinging to an older sibling. Lily One — the waspish girl with the long blonde hair and the curvy build — was alternately trying to calm down Twil and ducking her head to search among the sofa cushions and under the table. Lily Two — the freckled tomboy with the red hair, built like a tightly toned athlete — was glaring at the nearest groups of girls and nurses, as if examining faces for guilty looks.

“My book— no!” Twil sobbed. “I can’t! It’s— it’s the only copy! Please, I just— no— it was right—”

Lily Two suddenly shouted: “Who took it?! Which one of you took it?!”

An answering shout rose from the back of the dayroom, from a random unseen throat. “Must have been a nurse!”

“Yeah!” another girl agreed, somebody deep in a huddle of bodies, hidden from the staff. “Damn right, it was probably a nurse! Confiscating all our stuff! Fucking bitches!”

“Give it back!” shouted a third voice.

“Return her book!” yet another took up the cause. “Come on, it’s not fair!”

“Give it back! Give it back!”

“Give her back her book, you cunts!”

“Give it back! Give it back! Give it back!”

The words became a chant, spreading across the dayroom.

All around us groups of girls were turning on their chaperones and guardians; little angry mobs rose to their feet and took up the chant, while other girls sat back on the sofas and raised their fists in the air, adding their voices to the chorus. Some surrounded their respective nurses, while others ignored their ineffectual staff escort. Sleepy nurses jerked awake in the sudden panic, while others chattered into hand-held walkie talkies, backing away from the growing anger. A cluster of fresh nurses appeared in the archway and hurried into the room, spreading out as back-up. A pair of Knights followed them — though with far less clarity of purpose; the Knights shuffled into the dayroom for a moment, stood there looking very awkward, then shuffled out again.

I halted.

I drew the wheelchair to a stop about ten feet shy of our exit, blocking the passage between an empty row of three sofas and a little table piled with girl’s magazines, the covers all smiling and teeth and shining white eyeballs. The nearest group of patients was to our rear, all facing toward the commotion as Twil began to weep and wail.

“Heather?” Evelyn hissed. “Heather, what are you doing? Don’t stop here, not now.”

“Evee, they’re going to start another riot!”

Evee twisted in her wheelchair so I could see her craggy frown. “Good. Buys us more time. Maybe they’ll injure a few more nurses or burn down a wing of this place while they’re at it. Come on, Heather, get us out before the—”

“We have to start the plan right now,” I hissed. “We have to get Twil and her friends to follow us, right now. We can’t wait and do it later!”

The ringing chorus of “Give it back! Give it back!” rose louder and louder. Somebody shouted; another girl squealed in pain. A nurse tumbled backward into a chair, going sprawling on the floor.

Somebody else cheered.

Evelyn snapped at me. “The whole place might follow us! The nurses might follow us. Heather, we need to stick to the plan. I’ve bought Twil plenty of time with my changes to her board game—”

“There’s no time to go through the whole rigmarole!” I raised my voice above the chant. “Evee, look!”

I pointed back.

Violence bubbled beneath the surface of the widening disturbance: one or two girls pushed or shoved their respective nurses; a few nurses raised their hands in response, threatening more than they dared deliver. Several nurses were being forced back by miniature picket lines of chanting patients — “Give it back! Give it back!” — while the more vulnerable girls sheltered behind their companions.

Horror cut through the chaos like a shark through tropical waters. Lines of girls parted before her. Nurses turned away as she walked by.

Twil couldn’t see her coming, because her eyes were full of tears and her glasses were missing. But the Lillies could. Lily Two turned to face Horror, chin high, fists clenched. Lily One tried to pull Twil away from the sofa and the board game, retreating from their pursuer.

If this all exploded into violence, we would not be able to protect Twil. Horror would still get exactly what she wanted.

And so would the institution; the ratio of girls to nurses simply wasn’t high enough. The patients had been split up and divided, prepared for what Raine might call ‘defeat in detail’. If the staff had to face the entire body of the patients as one, organized and moving in unison, following one will, with one aim, then the institution would stand no chance. But the staff had determined the composition and layout of this space. Willing combatants were mixed in with younger girls, the stronger groups split up and unable to form a united front. As I watched I saw those who could not fight struggle to worm their way out of the growing scrum. Patients ready to throw down were not shoulder-to-shoulder, but halfway across the dayroom from each other. More nurses piled in through the archway, ready to put down this brief convulsion of a bound giant.

“Evee, we can’t let another riot happen, not yet.”

“What?!” Evee spluttered. “I thought you and Raine were all for another bit of popular violence. I thought that was what we wanted?”

“They’re not ready!” I hissed. “They’re not prepared! This is the worst condition under which to launch a second attempt. This isn’t what Lozzie would have planned, and it’s only going to sap the strength of another revolt. Evee, we have to stop this, we have to start our plan right now.”

Evelyn clenched her teeth and looked like she wanted to spit. “We’ll be sitting ducks if we get this wrong.”

“Not if I move fast. I’ll let go of you, call out to Twil, then grab you again and run for the doors. It might work!”

Evelyn swallowed hard. The sound was drowned out by the rising chant all around us, by the angry shouts of, “Let us back to our rooms!”, “Where’d you take Vanessa and Riley, huh?! I haven’t seen them since yesterday!”, “Fuck off, fucking screws! Get your hands off me!”

“Heather,” Evee hissed, “you always do this, you always jump in—”

“I will not do this if you don’t consent,” I hissed quickly. “And I promise I will not leave you behind.”

“You—”

“If you disagree, then please, Evee, insist. Insist, and we’ll let the riot happen, we’ll go.”

Evelyn ground her teeth together so hard that they squeaked. But then she nodded. “Do it. Now. Quickly!”

I reached down and retrieved the leatherbound book from Evee’s lap, fingers fumbling, heart pounding. The soft brown leather was warm to the touch, warmer than it had any right to be, warm as sun-kissed bark in a summer forest. I held up the book in my left hand, keeping my right wrapped firmly around one handle of Evelyn’s wheelchair. I turned toward Twil and the Lillies, held the book up high, and let go of my anchor.

Visible, for just a second.

“Twilllll!” I shouted, my reedy little voice fighting against the growing chaos of the dayroom. “Twil!”

A few of the nearest girls glanced my way, but most of them were too preoccupied with the start of a second riot; a couple of nurses spared me a look, then did a double-take as they saw what I was holding aloft.

Lily Two looked around. Lily One looked up. Eyes widened. Brows furrowed. They saw me, clear and free.

Twil stared in my general direction, blinking away tears from her clouded eyes, panting for breath. Could she see that far without her glasses? I had to make her understand.

“I’m taking it outdoors, Twil! I’ll drench it in the rain! If you want it, come get it back!”

Horror halted her advance on Twil. She turned her head and looked right at me, then frowned with professional irritation, like I was a farm animal escaped from my pen.

Horror pointed and opened her mouth wide, about to shout some order to the other nurses.

I grabbed the handle of Evee’s wheelchair and resumed invisibility, vanishing from sight and mind alike. Horror’s orders died on hesitating lips. Her frown did not quite clear, but her eyes slid away from me. The Lillies suffered the same fate, forgetting I was there but retaining their emotional response. Twil just stared at the archway out, at the exit.

Fingers shaking like crazy, I shoved the holy book back into Evelyn’s lap. All around us the little groups of patients were trailing off with their chanting, the reason for their rage short-circuited, even if they couldn’t remember exactly why. The spark of the premature riot was snuffed out. I offered an apology and a prayer to Lozzie, whenever she was, hoping that this aligned with her far more experienced plans for productive rabble-rousing.

“Go, Heather, go! Now!” Evelyn hissed.

I didn’t need to be ordered twice. I felt like the Eye itself was opening above me. I grabbed both handles and hurried for the archway, shoulder blades tingling as I felt four sets of eyes burning into my back.

Evelyn and I burst out onto the wooden tiles of the entrance hall.

More nurses were hurrying into the dayroom, but the general panic seemed to have subsided. The chanting had died away to nothing, replaced by the unsatisfied grumbling murmur of a reluctant but grudging crowd.

“Don’t stop again,” Evelyn hissed. “Get us outdoors, ASAP.”

“Right! Yes! Absolutely! One hundred percent!”

We left the same way we’d entered, past a pair of Knightly guards and out through the side-entrance, back into the little swirls of drizzling rain, beneath the wrinkled black underside of the Eye, beyond the walls of Cygnet Asylum. We descended the concrete switchback ramp at speed, the wheelchair tires whispering against the damp surface, then out onto the brick pathways, out into the saturated lawns of the hospital grounds. I pulled one of the towels back up over Evelyn’s shoulders and head, to protect her from the worst of the rain; she hurried to stash Twil’s book and Twil’s glasses beneath her grey dressing gown. We weren’t actually going to damage or destroy the book — we had no idea what that might do. We just needed her to follow us. I wouldn’t have been able to countenance damaging a book regardless, whatever it contained.

I hurried away from the front of the building. Misty raindrops clung to my hair and face, swirling in the gyre of my breath.

“Heather, slow down,” Evelyn hissed. “Slow down. We’ve made it out. They still can’t see us. Slow down, slow down.”

“Alright—” I panted, heart still racing. The wound in my left leg burned like a hot iron pressed into my flesh, but I did my best to ignore it, despite my awkward limp. “What now? We need them to follow, don’t we? What—”

“Pull me to one side, off the path. Watch the doorways.”

“But the muddy ground—”

“Just do it. Please.”

I did as Evelyn instructed, wheeling her just off the path and onto the wet grass. The wheels of her chair sunk into the damp earth, but only a little — it wouldn’t be too difficult to push her back onto the pathway. We were completely concealed here, beneath the invisible aura of the Fadestone.

“And pull your own towel back up,” Evelyn hissed. “No sense in you getting all wet as well.”

“Oh, of course,” I muttered, pulling the towel back over my own head and shoulders, making sure to keep one hand on the wheelchair at all times. I tugged my yellow blanket snug around my shoulders as well, to keep off the chill.

The fleshless skull of Cygnet Asylum stared down upon us with a hundred empty sockets, all-seeing yet blinded to our presence. Red-brick naked bone was streaked with the dark stain of the rain, running in slow rivulets down blank windows, dribbling from cold gutters, clinging to spongy, porous, rotting masonry. The skull no longer seemed so empty on the inside; it teemed with the sound of burrowing life, of nurses and patients and Knights, each straining in their own way against the bonds of the institution.

The underside of the Eye loomed over it all, a backdrop to all motion and stillness, from horizon to horizon, all the sky forever and evermore.

I tore my eyes away from that false firmament and back to the hospital. “They’re not coming,” I hissed. “I don’t see anybody coming to the doors.”

“Wait for it.”

“Evee?”

“I know Twil better than you and Raine ever will,” she murmured. “No offense. I have seen her without her kit on, after all.”

I sighed, breath still all a-quiver with adrenaline. “Evee, seeing somebody naked doesn’t mean you know them any better.” I cleared my throat. “You really did, though?”

“Mhmm.”

“... what do her tattoos look like?”

“Breathtaking. Now shhh, watch the doors. She’ll be here. I know her. Even in a dream, she would never — ah. There we go.”

Evelyn’s eyesight was better than mine; she’d spotted movement in the gloomy entrance hall a split-second before me. A moment later, Twil burst from the side-doors next to the hospital’s main entrance. She barely looked like herself — a scrawny girl wearing a starched grey uniform, face streaked with tears, screwed up with redcheeked fury and bottled frustration, little fists clenched at her sides. Her dark hair was a mess, as if her natural curls were straining against the artificial straightening of the dream.

She bypassed the disabled ramp and stomped down the stairs, flicking her head left and right, looking for the scoundrel who had stolen her new religion.

“Oh, Twil,” I murmured. “She looks awful.”

“She’ll be fine soon enough,” Evelyn hissed. “Hold still.”

The Lillies emerged moments later, flying to Twil’s sides, flanking her like a pair of bodyguards. Lily One carried a wide umbrella, shielding Twil and herself from the drizzling rain. Lily Two had dragged a thin raincoat over her grey uniform, a translucent piece of flimsy plastic not good for much except keeping the water off; she had something long and dark curled inside the raincoat, tucked half-within her uniform blazer.

Twil gestured helplessly at the asylum grounds, hands flapping, face collapsing into tears all over again. Lily One attempted to comfort her, while Lily Two peered at the tendrils of woodland, moving her head back and forth as if trying to catch sight of a thief fleeing through the trees.

About fifty feet to the trio’s collective right lay a long flowerbed, lining the front of the main body of the hospital building, just beneath the wide window which looked out from the dayroom. Before either of the Lillies could even think about abandoning their search or coaxing Twil back indoors, a low, dark, fast-moving shape burst from the flowerbed, crossed the lawns at a dead-sprint lope, and plunged into the nearest fringe of woodland.

“Oh, well done!” I hissed a muted cheer. “Well done, Raine. Gosh, I’m surprised she remembered her instructions so well.”

“Huh,” Evelyn grunted. “At least she’s quick on her feet. She better bloody well wait for us, or this could become a complete disaster.”

“She will!” I whispered. “I trust her. Have faith, Evee.”

“Huh.”

Twil and her Lillies were already stepping onto the brick pathways, hurrying in the general direction of Raine’s forest-bound shadow. Lily Two led the way, jogging ahead to make sure she didn’t lose the scent. She passed within two feet of Evelyn and I, splashing through the shallow puddles gathered in the pockets of mortar between the bricks. Her eyes were set and serious, focused on her task. She moved with almost canine grace and purpose, a tracker hound pointing the way along Raine's trail.

Twil and Lily One followed a little way behind, sheltered beneath the umbrella, holding hands. Twil was still a sobbing mess, clinging on tight. Lily One kept the umbrella steady and led Twil onward with unerring steps. They passed by us too, almost close enough to touch.

"—she— I— I don't—" Twil was heaving for breath between her broken words. "I can't believe somebody would take my book like that! It's so cruel! There's no reason but to hurt me!"

"It's okay, Twillamina," Lily One purred, her voice a burning cocktail of velvet comfort and tightly controlled anger. "We'll get it back. That ... very silly person has no idea who she's messing with. Right? Isn't that right? Nobody messes with us three, right?"

"Right," Twil whined, through a face full of snot and tears.

It hurt to see Twil — so confident and cocky, so full of irrepressible energy, so strong and nigh-near invincible — reduced to this weepy parody of herself.

Twil and the Lillies hurried past us, splashing down the pathways, about to plunge into the woods.

"Right," Evelyn hissed from beneath the shelter of her increasingly damp towel. "Heather, take us back to the pavilion."

"The 'ron-day-voo'," I said, forcing a little giggle past my stretched nerves. I pushed Evee's wheelchair back onto the path and turned to follow the Lillies. "Raine did rather enjoy using that word. Pity we didn't have any watches to synchronize or anything."

"Don't give her ideas," Evelyn grunted. "The state she's in, she'll start giving us bloody code names."

"Oh? The state she's in?"

"Regressed," Evelyn snorted.

"You mean this is how she used to be? Before I knew her? When you first met her?"

Ahead of us, the Lillies stepped off the brick pathways and onto the forest trails of woodchip and mulch, with Twil between them. They plunged into the trees, out of sight within seconds. We would need to go around them to reach the pavilion and the spot where Raine had been instructed to wait.

“Mmhhh,” Evelyn grunted. “Sort of. She’s always been insufferable about that sort of thing. Code names, military jargon. Even when we were younger.”

“Well,” I said. “I wouldn’t mind if Raine gave me a code name. Maybe it would be cute.”

Evelyn sighed. “She seems to have given you one already. ‘Sweet thing’. Which is awful, for the record. I resent having to witness that over and over again.”

A blush crept into my cheeks. “Yes, well. I didn’t ask for that. And that’s hardly a proper ‘code name’. Code names should be like in that one video game Raine plays, the one with the cardboard boxes and the talking heads on the radio.”

“Heather, what are you blathering on about?”

The forest loomed over us. I left the pathway again, heading to the right. The wheels of Evee’s chair sank into the mushy grass, but soon we would be under the canopy, protected from the worst of the rain.

“You know!” I said, warming to the absurdity of my subject; we both needed an antidote to the panic and mayhem of the last few minutes. “Proper code names, like the ones in that game. ‘Sturdy Serpent’, names like that.”

Evelyn twisted in her chair, bringing a tight squint around upon me like the guns of a very irritable little ship. But I loved that look, I loved her confounded face, concealing her simple joy. We would fill these few minutes with much-needed relief before we joined back up with Raine. Evee opened her mouth and started to say something — but then she cut off, eyes going wide.

“Heather, stop!”

I jerked us to a sudden halt, then followed Evee’s gaze.

A fourth figure was making her way down the red brick pathways, sensible shoes splashing in the little puddles. Holding an umbrella over her head, white uniform half concealed beneath the puffy exterior of a large raincoat, eyes scanning the edge of the woods, there she was, yet again.

Horror. Our nurse.

“Shit,” Evelyn hissed between her teeth. “Shit, shit, shit. I thought we’d shaken her.”

Horror’s eyes suddenly flickered with recognition, then narrowed into a very nasty frown.

“Evee!” I squeaked. “She’s looking right at us! She can see us!”

“I know!” Evelyn snapped. “Because I’m panicking! Give me a moment to calm down. Calm. Calm.” Evelyn took a deep breath, then two, then three. Horror picked up her pace, trotting toward us, opening her mouth to shout something. “Calm. Calm. We are not here. We are not here. We cannot be seen. We are unseen. We are not here. We are not here.”

Evelyn’s voice dropped into a sleepy chant. Horror slowed, blinking with confusion, eyes sliding off us once again. She glanced left and right at the rim of the woods. Evelyn took several slow, deep, steady breaths. I stayed absolutely silent, cold sweat plastered down my back and beneath my armpits.

“Alright,” Evelyn murmured, soft and relaxed, calmer than I’d thought possible. “We’re safe.”

“Good. Well done, well done,” I whispered. “But ... Evee, we can’t do this if she’s following. We can’t.”

“We’ll just have to get Raine to cut her head off.”

When she said it with that sleepy, relaxed, matter-of-fact tone, I almost believed it might work.

“Evee, I don’t think it’ll help. I’m serious.”

“No,” Evelyn said. “No, this is congruent with the narrative, with the play. A bunch of monsters lure a nurse out into the woods? She’s not even armed. She’s totally alone. She’s walking into a rainy woodland with no back up. I think we should try it. If we can. Fuck her. We put her down before she gets her hands on Twil again.”

“I ... oh, she’s ... ”

Horror walked right toward us.

Her eyes did not pause on me and Evelyn a second time, but lingered on the edge of the woods, scanning the trees for any sign of her wayward patients and inmates, her cunning little escapees. She strode down the path with a solid, steady click-click-click of her sensible shoes.

She drew level with Eeve and I, about fifteen feet away, on the path itself. She stopped.

Horror sighed.

“Where oh where have you gone, you three?” she said to herself. “I suppose I’m going to have to find you myself, and bring you back indoors, aren’t I? I never like solitary confinement for good girls, and you’re all usually so ... so good. But one of you was cheating at our board game, I’m sure of that. And now you don’t even want to play. Perhaps I’ll organise a separate game with each of you. Yes, that’s a good idea. One on one, one by one. No more support.”

Horror turned her head. She looked right at me and Eeve.

My heart climbed into my throat. Sweat broke out on my face. Evelyn murmured a mantra — “You cannot see us. We are unseen. You cannot see us. We are unseen. You cannot see us.”

“I wonder which way they went?” Horror said. Then she smiled and shrugged, like a comedy character pressed into the wrong role in a horror movie. “Oh well. I’ll just have to set off and find out. All sorts of things happen to good girls gone astray in the woods, after all. You never know what might transpire out there, with the animals and the crazies and the weird old trees. Off we go then!”

Horror stepped off the pathway and strode right past me and Eeve. She plunged into the woods, swallowed up in seconds. Her footsteps vanished along with her form.

Evelyn let out a deep breath, slow and steady.

“What do we do?” I hissed. “We can’t deal with her. We can’t even kill her, I’m pretty sure she’ll just come back. Even the King in Yellow couldn’t put her down.”

“Raine,” Evelyn grunted. “Pavilion. Now.”

Less than five minutes later — five minutes of pushing Evelyn's wheelchair down the woodchip pathways which wiggled and wriggled their way through the dripping woods, five minutes of keeping one ear cocked for the sounds of other footsteps tramping through the undergrowth, five minutes of hoping for a glance of Twil or her Lillies through the trees, and praying that we would not blunder into Horror's sight once again — we reached the place where the trails ran out, where they collapsed into disuse, where wood chips melted into leaf-strewn forest floor. We retraced the steps we'd taken to find the pavilion the first time, down past a little rise, then out into a tiny clearing.

The pavilion, our latest temporary base camp, was waiting exactly as we'd left it, an ugly little parody of a woodland cottage with its horrible plastic red roof and concrete floor and hard benches.

Raine was right where she was supposed to be, following her instructions to the letter. She was crouched down behind the end of one of the benches, peering over the armrest at the opposite tree line. I couldn't see anything in the direction she was looking, but I trusted her instincts better than my own — at least when I lacked all six tentacles and any semblance of abyssal self-hood.

Raine had our supplies slung over one shoulder, safely within the canvas shopping bag she'd stolen on the previous night. She held her machete in her other hand, tucked away inside the sheath.

"Quickly!" Evelyn hissed. "Touch her before she moves!"

I hurried over to the pavilion and wheeled Evelyn's chair onto the concrete foundation, finally out of the rain once again; fat droplets of cold water splashed onto our extremely damp towels as we passed beneath the rim of the red plastic roof. Raine glanced around at us, eyes sliding away as if her vision was greased; even she couldn't see us through the Fadestone's magic.

Raine's clothes were damp with both water and sweat. Her hair was swept back with the lingering raindrops. Her feet were filthy with mud from running through the woods. Her eyes were wide and alert, every muscle pulled taut with readiness to spring up and sprint away.

I'd never seen Raine like this before — more like a skittish deer than a predator. Raine was often ready for rapid movement, for violence, for swinging fists or a weapon. But she was rarely tense with flight.

She wasn't scared though, just trying to keep ahead of a hunter she did not want to slay. She could hardly unsheathe her machete against Twil and the Lillies.

I stopped Eevee's wheelchair at Raine's side, let go with one hand, and grabbed Raine's shoulder.

"Woah!" Raine flinched hard, eyes flying wide with shock, almost recoiling from me — but her free hand came up and clamped over mine, holding steady even as she jerked backward.

"It's me! It's us! Hi! Hi, Raine!"

Raine panted for a second, eyes wide, mouth hanging open. Then she started to laugh. "Oh, haha, oh wow. Oh, wow, that is weird. That is a unique sensation. Haha! Hey there, sweet thing. Hey there, Eevee. Hoooooooo that's ... yeah, unique."

"What?" Evelyn demanded. "What's unique?"

"Memories and clarity all rushing back," Raine said. "Ten seconds ago I wasn't quite sure what I was doing crouching down here, 'cept waiting for you two." Her eyes flashed toward the tree line. "We're invisible like this, right? Invisible and unheard?"

"Yes, that's right," I said.

Evelyn grunted. "Just don't surprise me or jog my arms, or my concentration will shatter."

Raine straightened up, careful to keep physical contact with me at all times; I wished I had all my parts and selves, my extra limbs, so I could simply anchor us together without all this fuss. Raine reached over and held the opposite handle of Eevee's wheelchair, so I could stop worrying about losing contact again. I reached up and touched her head, running my fingers through her hair and down the back of her neck. She showed her teeth and closed her eyes, purring with deep satisfaction. I felt a blush creeping up my cheeks, though this was hardly the time.

"Good ... good girl, Raine," I murmured. "You did really, really well. You followed all your instructions. Good girl."

"Mmmmm," she purred, then cracked her eyes open again. "Had to improvise when I saw our target and her pair of indentured fuck servants come out of the hospital. So what happened? We moved our plans forward? I'm game for that."

I lowered the damp towel from over my head, then helped Evelyn do the same with her own.

"First," said Evelyn, "where's the fox, where's my grandmother?"

Raine shook her head, glancing toward the tree line again. "She ran off. Doing her own thing somewhere. Couldn't have stopped her even if I'd tried."

"Huh," Evelyn grunted. "Fine. Pass Praem back to me, please."

"Sure thing."

Raine reached into the canvas bag and produced the Praem Plushie. We'd left Praem with Raine in order to avert a worst-case scenario, in case Evee and I ended up getting compromised or captured. With Praem at her side, Raine stood a better chance of breaking us back out. With the plan a success for now, it was time to return daughter to mother.

The Praem Plushie looked identical to before. The flat eyes, the straight-line mouth, the soft felt-fuzz hair. Those flat eyes lingered on me as Raine placed the doll into Evee's lap. Evelyn took one hand off the Fadestone so she could tuck Praem safely inside her grey dressing gown once more, alongside the book.

"Come on then," Raine said. "Gimme the low-down, debrief me. Where do we stand? What's the plan?"

"We got Twil to follow us," I said. "We have the book, and also her eyeglasses."

Raine snorted with laughter. "Nice score."

"But we have an unforeseen complication."

Evelyn and I quickly explained what had happened inside the hospital building, including the details of the board game and Twil's book — which we showed to Raine, just in case. Raine nodded along with great interest as Evelyn rattled off how the pair of Lillies had actually protected Twil, how they'd been flanking her to keep Horror from winning at the strange board game. We told Raine what had happened upon our escape, and who had unexpectedly joined us.

Raine winced. "Horror, right. Our fat-bottomed fuck-pig pretend nurse. I thought I saw a fourth figure in the woods on my way back."

I hissed through my teeth. "Oh no, she's not caught up with them already, has she?"

Raine shook her head and pointed at the tree line, directly opposite the bench, where she'd been staring earlier. "Nah. Twil and her goon-twins are circling the forest, left first, then right. They'll pass through here if they keep going, I'm pretty sure. Miss Spank bait—"

"Tch, Raine," I said. "Must you?"

Raine laughed. "Spank bait. Horror. The nurse. Come on, she's somebody's walking fantasy. I'm trying to break her down here, sweet thing. If this is a dream, she's gotta be dismantled."

"I ... well ... fair enough," I sighed.

Evelyn rolled her eyes. "Keep it in your knickers for five seconds, Raine, please."

Raine smirked. "Alright, alright, I give in. Our extremely fuckable nurse is tracing the edge of the woods, as far as I can tell from what little I saw of her. If she makes it all the way down here it won't be for a while yet. We've maybe got fifteen minutes in this spot."

"We need to bait Twil," Evelyn said, before I could call Raine a 'bad girl' for getting weird about Horror. "We're on a clock, a time limit. We need to peel her off, get her alone. Ideas, now. Go."

Raine shrugged. "We could wait here for about another ten seconds."

Evelyn sighed. "Really?"

"Um," I added. "Yes, Raine, excuse me?"

Raine held one hand to her right ear. "Listen."

We all fell silent. The crunching of leaves beneath three pairs of shoes reached my ears moments later.

Raine winked and put a finger to her lips.

Lily Two appeared first, emerging from between the trees as a ghostly transparent blur topped with a head of flame. She stepped out into the clearing and resolved into nothing more outlandish than a young woman wrapped in a raincoat, with red hair beneath the flimsy hood. She paused for a second, surprised at the pavilion, then stepped beneath the roof and lowered her plastic hood. Her eyes flickered across the concrete floor, lingered on the empty fire pit, and examined the wooden benches. Then she sniffed, drawing a deep breath through her nose.

A muffled call came from beyond the tree line. “Lil?”

Lily Two turned and replied. “Here! There’s a building!”

Lily One slunk out of the woods like a feline predator — not on the prowl, but promenading for all to see, showing off her sheen and shine, her sleek sinuous movements, her slender muscle and smooth surfaces. Long blonde hair swayed as she stepped forth, sharp eyes darting around the clearing, face pinched with superior irritation and elevated anger. She held her umbrella firmly in one hand, and Twil in the other.

Twil looked lost and sad, half-blind without her thick glasses. Her neatly polished black shoes were covered in woodland mud. Her thick dark tights were splashed with rainwater. Her hair was all frizzy with the humidity in the air. Her grey tie was loose. She sagged with melancholy and exhaustion as Lily One helped her across the clearing and beneath the roof of the pavilion.

She seemed a bedraggled kitten next to these elemental forces of sapphic fantasy.

Lily One lowered the umbrella and blew out a big sigh. “Didn’t know this was out here,” she said, then wrinkled her nose. “Ugh, it’s covered in cobwebs and dust. What is this even for, camp fires and singalongs?”

Lily Two sniffed the air again, taking deep breaths through her nose.

Raine whispered: “Do we make a move?”

“Not sure,” Evelyn murmured. “Let’s watch them for a moment.”

I hissed, “You know what to say to Twil, though, Evee? You have a plan, correct?”

“Mhmm,” Evelyn grunted. “I was going to speak to her about being a werewolf. But now I’ve seen her, and seen these two ... I don't know. I may have been wrong. Let's watch them for a moment. Then we can get close and take them all at once, get me in front of Twil, get me space to speak with her."

"Gotta make a move sooner or later," said Raine.

"Yes, yes," Evelyn hissed. "Just let me gather data."

Twil whined, gasping for breath. Her legs were quivering. "I have to sit, I must sit down," she panted.

"Oh!" Lily One tutted. "Twillamina, no, these benches are filthy. Can you not hold on? We ... well, no, I suppose we can't turn around, can we? Damn it. Damn it all to hell, this is so unfair."

"I really do have to sit," Twil whined. Her face scrunched up, threatening fresh tears. "I'm so sorry, I'm really sorry. I'm so weak —"

"You are not weak!" Lily One said, then burst into a big bright smile. "Here." She let go of Twil's hand, put her umbrella down on one of the benches, and then quickly unbuttoned her blazer.

"Oh!" Twil's eyes went wide. "No! No, I couldn't—"

"Tch!" Lily One tutted. "Nonsense. What's ours is yours." She peeled the smartly pressed grey blazer away from her shoulders, reducing herself down to shirt and tie above her grey skirt. Then she shook out the blazer and draped it over the bench, to act as a cover for Twil's sensitive bottom. "Here. Sit. Sit!"

Lily One herded Twil onto the bench. Twil eased herself down, then sighed with visible relief. "T-thank you. Thank you. You two do so much for me, more than I deserve."

"Don't talk such utter rubbish, Twillamina." Lily One laughed. "We both love you very much. And you do just as much for us, you do know that, don't you?"

Twil tried to smile. "I do hope we can find the book. I ... I don't know what'll happen without it."

"Yes, so do I. It's alright though. We don't need it." She tapped her chest, just over her heart. "The real words are always in here."

"Mm," Lily Two grunted. She had stalked halfway around the perimeter of the pavilion, sniffing the air. "For her, maybe. But for you and I? Might be messy."

Lily One's sharp eyes flashed toward her counterpart. "Shh."

Twil looked up, mildly confused. "I'm sorry?"

Lily One smiled down at Twil. "It's nothing, love. Just ... you know we'll always be together, whatever happens. But you're right. If we don't have the book, we might not be able to protect you so competently. We won't go anywhere, I can promise that. But we'll lose our ... extra help. You need to be prepared."

Twil blinked several times. "I don't quite understand."

Lily One reached down and smoothed Twil's hair over her scalp. "It'll be alright." Then she sighed and tutted. "Oh, blast. This weather is doing a number on our hair, isn't it? Lil, you're so lucky with your rusty top," she said to Lily Two. "You never get frizzy."

"Mm," Lily Two just grunted.

Evelyn was frowning harder and harder. "What the hell are they talking about? Did you two catch that part?"

"I have no idea," I whispered. "I still can't figure out what they are, either to Twil, or outside the dream."

Raine purred: "You think they're more than just dream people?"

"Maybe," I said. "But I have no idea what."

Lily Two sniffed again, frowning at the scent she was picking up.

Lily One sighed and turned to her. "My darling, my dearest, the other half of my very being, what on earth are you doing?"

"I can smell her," Lily Two said. She slid something from inside her raincoat — a truncheon, made of black metal. "Both of them."

Lily One froze. "Oh?"

Lily Two nodded. "The nasty one, the brute who needed a shower. And the little one with the silly blanket."

I tutted, bristling, tugging my yellow blanket tighter around my shoulders. Raine just grinned.

Lily Two went on: "They were here. Maybe seconds before we arrived. There's other scents too, ones I don't know." She sniffed the air again. "A ... an animal? A dog or a fox or something. And another person, but I don't know her. Maybe something else too, something like a ... living ... pillow?"

"Wait a second," I whispered. "She's doing what Twil does. The real Twil, I mean, back in the real world. She's tracking by scent!"

"Fuck," Evelyn hissed. "I may have gotten this all wrong."

"Ah?"

Evelyn sighed. "These two might be parts of Twil herself. Which is not what I expected. Maybe I need to talk to all three of them."

"New plan?" Raine said.

"Maybe," Evelyn grunted.

Lily One just sighed. "We'll never track them in this rain. We've failed."

Lily Two turned toward her blonde counterpart. "We can't go back now." She gestured at Twil. "If we don't have the book, she gets left by herself."

Twil blinked at this exchange, as if she didn't quite comprehend. Lily One just smiled, then stroked Twil's hair again, and said: "Twillamina, darling, sweetheart? Lil and I need to have a little chat, is that okay?"

"Okay ... " Twil murmured, trailing off.

Lily One nodded, then turned back around and marched over to the other Lily, leaving Twil a little way behind.

"We're breaking role," she said, serious but not angry. "That's a risk. You know that's a risk. We're burning fuel just talking like this, let alone properly. One real sentence and we'd both pop."

Lily Two crossed her arms and held her nightstick in one loose hand. She looked uncomfortable. "We don't have a choice. We'll be dry in what — an hour? Two? And that's subjective time. Not objective! We could flash out and leave these archetypes as empty as nothing. Especially if the woman upstairs is paying any attention."

Lily One sighed — and glanced upward, at the sky, at the Eye.

"It's not paying attention," she said. "That's the problem."

My eyes went wide. My mouth hung open.

“What the ... ” Evelyn hissed.

“The more I hear the less I comprehend!” I whispered. “They can see it, they can see the Eye! What—”

Lily Two was already carrying on. “I hate this dream,” she said. “I hate dreams. Especially flat ones.”

“It’s nonsense,” Lily One agreed. “Everything is so washed out. One dimensional.”

“Humans.” Lily Two tutted.

Twil listened to this conversation as if nothing was out of place, as if her two bodyguards and lovers were not wildly yanking at the stage props and scenery and pulling up the boards beneath their own feet.

Lily One turned and frowned out into the woods. “Do you think one of them is the dreamer causing all this?”

“Can’t be,” Lily Two scoffed. “Humans can’t dream.”

“It was the riot leader,” Lily One added. “She was a dreamer. I wish we could contact her, but Twil’s terrified of her. There’s no chance.”

“And she’s not human,” Lily Two said. “Which is my entire point. Case dismissed.”

“Soooooo,” said Lily One, taking a deep breath, twirling bright blonde hair around the fingers of one hand. “Maybe one of the other humans is not ... human?”

“Yes!” I hissed. “I’m right here! Oh my gosh, Eevee, we have to talk to them. We have to—”

“Hold,” Evelyn said. “This could be a trap. We have no idea.”

Raine chuckled. “I like the blonde one. I’d let her lead me into a trap any day. Let’s rock and roll. Let’s go.”

“Raine!” I hissed.

But Lily One was turning in a little circle, eyes passing over the edge of the trees, lingering on the benches, darting about the narrow space beneath the pavilion.

“Are you out there, dreamer?” she said. “Are you watching us right now?”

Lily Two went stiff as she realised what her counterpart was suggesting. She raised her nightstick and started to wave it through the air, as if brushing cobwebs aside, checking for our presence. She was going in totally the wrong direction, facing away from us.

“Evee,” I hissed. “These must be the twins Stout was talking about! It’s the only thing that makes any sense!”

“Hold,” Evelyn grunted. “Hold steady. We don’t know what they are.”

Lily One sighed and opened her hands. “We’ve dropped our roles,” she said, speaking to the air, to the invisible presence, to us. “The more we do this, the faster we burn through our lucidity. And when that happens, Twillamina is all alone. Come on out if you’re there, dreamer. Come out so we can chat. Human or not.”

bedlam boundary – 24.18

Lily One fell silent as she awaited an answer to her open invitation — come out come out, wherever you are, you hidden watcher tucked into the blind folds of this darkly dripping dream.

She may as well have been talking to the Eye itself, for all she knew.

Maybe she did know. And we needed to find out.

Her own sharply narrowed eyes darted back and forth beneath the shelter of the pavilion roof, tracking across the damp-edged concrete foundation, searching for any sign or symbol out of place. Then her gaze ventured outward, scanning the woods for any lurking red points glowing in the undergrowth or peering around the tree trunks. Her shoulders and neck were tense with nervous energy. She wet her lips with a flicker of her tongue, then ran a hand through her luxurious mane of blonde hair; loose tresses of pale gold fell about her face.

Was she truly anxious, or was this another act, another layer of falsehood spun into convincing beauty by the logic of the dream, by Sevens' misappropriated skills, by myself and the Eye and the gyre of this nightmare, designed to draw me and mine out from our invisible pocket of safety?

“Come on,” she hissed, more to herself than to the assumption of an observer. “We can’t break role for long, we need to get back to our hiding place. If you’re there, please, come out.”

Lily Two stalked the perimeter of the pavilion’s concrete, parting air with the blunt metal of her nightstick. She swept the weapon in slow arcs of discovery, hoping to connect with the postulated secret audience of this silly little play. Lithe and light and springy on her feet, she moved with the focus and dedication of a hound on the hunt, subtle muscles rolling and flexing beneath the thick fabric of her dark tights and the unflattering fall of her grey skirt. Red hair was swept back out of her freckled face, hairline touched with a sheen of sweat.

Watching them from my concealed position, I started to understand why these two were part of Twil's fantasy — both of these young women, about the same age as us, were frighteningly beautiful, like a pair of angels crammed down into human form.

"They're here," Lily Two repeated, then sniffed the air, nose twitching. "They're right here, and they all need a bath. I can smell them, I swear it."

Twil — Twillamina, locked deep in the dream — watched her bodyguards and lovers with uncomprehending eyes, her vision blinded and blurred by more than just her missing glasses. She sat on one of the benches all hunched and shrunken, her eyes red from hot panic and cold tears, with Lily One's grey blazer cushioning her backside, seemingly oblivious to the implications of the moment.

"I wish they'd just bring back my book," she whined in a pitiful little voice, not really herself, not the Twil I knew.

Beyond the pavilion, misty raindrops swirled in great wind-stroked masses. Leaves shivered against their fellows, sending a susurrant sigh across the woodland canopy. The trees seemed to lean inward, tucking us within a secluded bower.

"Evee," I hissed. My left palm was slippery with sweat on the handle of her wheelchair. "We have to show ourselves. We have to try talking."

Evelyn clenched her teeth. She kept her voice slow and calm, so as not to disrupt the magical effect of the Fadestone. "We have no idea what these two really are. Can we risk this?"

"They're reaching out to us," I whispered back. "They're trying to make contact, that's a big deal. And they're being polite and—"

Evelyn snorted. "'Being polite' qualifies them for nothing, let alone trust."

"They're lucid!" I hissed. "They're lucid in the dream! That has to mean something!"

"Heather—"

"And I think they might be the twins Stout was talking about, though I don't understand how. Evee, we can't let this opportunity go. Horror might be here soon, we need to talk with these two. And we can hardly rescue Twil if we don't show ourselves anyway! We have to do this, we may as well attempt diplomacy first!"

“Heather, that was an actual question. Pay attention to my words, not what you imagine I say.”

“Ah?”

Evelyn glanced up at me, snuggled down in her wheelchair. The Praem Plushie peeked out of the gap in her grey dressing gown.

“Can we risk this?” Evelyn repeated in a soft murmur. “Make the decision. If you think this is the right move, we’ll do it. I have no objections, but I want you to make the decision, properly.”

My throat closed up. How certain was I?

Raine carefully removed our bag of supplies from her shoulder and hung it from the other wheelchair handle, nice and low so it wouldn’t add too much counterweight to Evelyn up front. Raine made sure to keep one hand on the chair at all times, to maintain her own invisibility. Then she raised her sheathed machete to her own face and yanked the sheath off with her teeth. The blade glinted in the grey light of the drizzle beyond the pavilion.

She dropped the sheath into the bag and spun the machete over the back of her hand. Then she grinned, first at me, then at the Lillies, dragging her eyes up and down both of them as if sizing up an opponent in a boxing ring — or a partner on the other side of a bed.

“We can take ‘em if we have to fight, sweet thing,” she purred. “If this all goes tits up, I can take ‘em both.”

Evelyn huffed and rolled her eyes. “Oh yes, please do. Stabbing them to death with a bloody great knife will solve everything, of course. Raine, these women are parts of Twil. If you seriously hurt them I will personally find a dog to shit in your pillowcase every day for the rest of your life.”

“Um, yes,” I added quickly, catching Raine’s eye. “Though maybe not with the dog part. Raine, please, please don’t hurt them. I think Eevee’s right, they’re probably parts of Twil. The way they talk and move, even the way they look, it’s like bits of her, smeared around.”

“Phrasing, Heather,” Evelyn grunted. “Besides, I thought your theory was the opposite, that they’re Stout’s mysterious twins. Whatever that means.”

“Okay, well, maybe my theory is ... incomplete,” I admitted with a sigh. “But we’re not going to find out unless we talk to them!”

"Blade's just for show," Raine purred. "I promise. Sometimes you gotta front a bit if you wanna avoid a scrap."

"Good girl," I said on reflex; I was getting far too used to that. "Evee, please. We need to speak with them. If it all goes wrong, we can just vanish again. Can't we? We can vanish and run off into the woods. Yes, to answer your question properly. Yes, it is worth the risk."

Evelyn took a deep breath. She straightened up in her chair, doing her best to reassume the mantle of Evelyn Saye, Mage of Sharrowford, despite her withered body and fragile frame, her missing prosthetic, and her position tucked down in a wheelchair.

It worked. For a moment, Evelyn looked as if she sat upon a throne. Her face dropped into an easy sneer of casual superiority.

"Very well," she said. Her hands shifted beneath the layered folds of her grey dressing gown. "Both of you be ready. Our window may be very narrow, so do not hesitate. Raine, be prepared to move, but don't move too far, stay close. Heather, you need to start talking the moment I drop the Fadestone's effect. Stay in contact with the wheelchair if you can, because if anything goes wrong, I'll use the Fadestone again. You will get left behind if you're not in contact. Do you understand?"

Raine chuckled. "You wouldn't do that, my dark and mysterious magician girl. You'd never leave me behind."

"I bloody well would leave you behind, you fool," Evelyn hissed. "And you would do well to act like it."

Raine cracked a grin. "Very well, captain Saye. Drop out of stealth and drop our shields. The away party is ready for transport. Three to beam down. Four if we count Praem."

I squint-frowned at Raine. "Excuse me?"

Raine chuckled. "Never mind, sweet thing. It would take too long to explain. Tell you later."

"Heather, concentrate," Evelyn hissed. "You need to do the talking, and do it quickly. If this works, then I'll deal with Twil, but you are up first. Are you ready?"

I took a deep breath, tugged my yellow blanket tighter around my shoulders, and raised my head; I did not feel ready, not remotely. I felt ugly and incomplete, small and weird and reduced, like a squid washed up on a beach and denied the cool waters of the ocean. I was damp with rainwater and my left shin throbbed like somebody had been hitting it with a sledgehammer for the last three days. Without my other six selves or my six beautiful tentacles, I felt as if I was about to give a presentation while stark naked and covered in filth. I felt vulnerable and vile, especially when compared with Twil's effortless angelic beauty, Lily One's queen-bee femininity, and Lily Two's predatory athleticism.

But victory left me no other choice; saving Twil left me no options. So I nodded, and lied, "Yes. I'm ready."

"On three," Evelyn said, trying to keep the tremor from her voice. "One."

Raine raised her machete and rolled her shoulders. I puffed out my chest and tried to look confident, tried to envision myself with all my limbs, a mouth full of sharp teeth, and eyes glowing neon pink. I was still myself here, even if I was scattered. Still Heather Morell. Still everything I was meant to be, and no dream could deny that, not for much longer.

"Two."

Lily One started to turn away, opening her mouth, perhaps to call out again. Lily Two lowered her nightstick, about to give up on her search. Twil looked down into her own lap, bottom lip all a-wobble, despairing at ever recovering her oh-so-precious tome.

"Three," Evelyn finished. "Now."

Our unveiling went unannounced — no crackle of static or thump of displaced air, no magical fwoomp or tingle of power dancing across my scalp, no change in perception or sensation to tell me that the Fadestone's magic no longer concealed us from prying eyes.

We were simply, suddenly, silently there.

Lily One flinched and leapt back, hands out to ward us off, eyes wide in shock. Lily Two caught us in her peripheral vision, then whirled around and raised her nightstick. Twil shot to her feet, mouth hanging open.

"Hello!" I said, putting one hand up in an open-palmed greeting. "Hello, hi, yes, it's us. We don't mean you any—"

“Hey hey hey,” Lily Two said, striding forward, brandishing her weapon, flapping her transparent raincoat wide like a billowing cape. “You three have a lot of explaining to do.”

Raine whirled her machete outward, pointing with the tip of darkly gleaming metal. A grin ripped across her face. “You best step off, carrot-top,” she purred. “I’ve got edge, but you’re all blunt. I’ll fuck you inside out if you’re not careful.”

“A knife?” Lily Two sneered, but she slammed to a halt. “As if that matters? I can break that knife in one hit, thank you?”

Lily One raised both hands and gestured toward Lily Two, suddenly trying to play peacemaker. “My darling bud-mate, slow your roll—”

“We don’t mean you any harm!” I finally managed to shout. “We just want to—”

“My book!” Twil shrieked.

Her voice cut through everyone and everything, blotting out the sound of the rain and the leaves and the drip-drip-drip of water falling from the pavilion roof, smashing through our voices and thoughts alike, as if she was the only real thing present in the clearing. For a split-second there was no sound and no motion, only Twil’s sudden outrage.

Then the strange spell broke and Twil marched right up to the brewing confrontation, her brow furrowed, her lips compressed with futile fury, her eyes brimming with a threat of fresh tears. Lily One and Two both tried to ward her off or hold her back, but she pushed past them and planted her feet directly in front of Raine and Evelyn and me.

“You stole my book!” she squawked. “One of you did! Give it back! Give it back, it’s not yours, give it—”

“For pity’s sake,” Evelyn hissed. Twil halted, blinking rapidly, squinting to see Evelyn’s face through the veil of poor eyesight. “Stop whining, Twil. It’s right here.” Evelyn dug around inside her grey dressing gown and produced the heavy leather-bound book. “Here. See? Safe and sound. And not going anywhere.”

Twil’s eyes lit up with relief. “That’s— please— I need—”

She reached for the stolen tome — then recoiled from the flat of Raine’s machete.

“Raine—!” I hissed.

“Ah ah ah ahhhhh,” Raine purred, her voice trailing off into a long slow rasp. She held Twil’s terrified eyes, then flickered her gaze to the bodyguards. Both the Lillies were paused and tense, ready to spring to Twil’s defence the moment that machete turned edge-on. Raine spoke, nice and slow: “Here’s what we’re gonna do, you comedy threesome. We’re gonna give you the book, and you’re gonna agree to talk. Do we have a deal?”

“It’s mine!” Twil shouted, voice gone shrill and cracked. “You have no right to do this! No right at all! This is stealing! I can’t believe anybody — let alone a young lady — would steal on purpose like this. It’s unthinkable. It’s grotesque. It’s— it’s—”

“Never known you to be above a spot of shoplifting,” Evelyn grumbled.

Twil blinked down at her. “E-excuse me?”

“You heard me.”

“Who are you, anyway?” Twil demanded. “I don’t understand why you’re all treating me like this, it’s so horrid!”

Evelyn sucked on her teeth. “You two — the lucid pair, I’m talking to you — what does the book represent, hm? What does this mean?”

Lily One narrowed her eyes. “No chance, not before it’s returned to her.”

“Twil, please,” I said, trying to play the polite cop to Raine’s bad cop and Evelyn’s too-familiar-encouraging-you-to-recommit-to-crime-cop. “We only—”

“Twillamina,” Lily Two interrupted, speaking directly to me. “You will address her by her full name.”

I started to sigh, but Lily One spoke up before I could lose any of my temper. “Yes, it’s important,” she said, eyebrows raised. “Please, don’t use the short version of her name, at least not directly. It’s dangerous. Understand?”

“Alright, alright,” I said, hands up in exasperated surrender.

“Twillamina, we only took your book in order to bait you out here, so we could talk. I’m sorry it’s so distressing, I didn’t realise it would upset you quite this badly. We'll give it back, we just want to know you won't all run away. Is that fair? I think that's fair. Please, do tell me if you think it's unfair."

"Here," Evelyn grunted. "I'll give you these for free. A show of good faith."

Evelyn produced Twil's glasses from inside her dressing gown and held them out. Twil's mouth fell open. She hesitated, glancing at Raine for permission to reach forward.

Raine shot her a wink and said, "I won't cut you, girl. Go ahead."

Twil eased forward with exaggerated care, as if Evelyn was a cobra poised to strike at her hand. She snatched her glasses from Eeve's fingers and pulled away. She fumbled the frames back onto her face, blinking and squinting through the ridiculously thick glass. The circular lenses made her amber eyes look huge, like a bug or an alien, or one of Evelyn's less well-proportioned anime girls.

She blinked at Eeve several times, then put her fingertips to her mouth. A slow blush crept up her cheeks.

"Remember me yet?" Evelyn grunted.

"No ... " Twil said. "I-I mean yes, but no. No!"

Lily One straightened up and tossed her hair back, golden mane arranged over her shoulders. She put both hands on her hips, adopting an imperious pose. "All right then," she said, enunciating her words with great precision. "Return the book to Twillamina, and we shan't depart. We won't open any hostilities either. Will we?" Her eyes slide sideways, toward Lily Two. "Will we, my dearest?"

Lily Two sighed and rolled her eyes. "We won't be the ones to start it. But we could win it. You know we could."

"And where would that leave us?" Lily One asked, not so gently.

"If you're correct."

"I am correct," Lily One countered. Her gaze flickered back to us. "Or at least I'm willing to gamble."

"Thank you," I said.

Lily Two grumbled a wordless complaint, but she lowered her nightstick and shrugged all the same. Raine copied her gesture, lowering the machete and bowing her head to her counterpart, though a nasty grin lingered on her face. Lily Two rolled her eyes and wrinkled her nose with open contempt. Raine looked her up and down with naked appreciation.

“Nice legs,” Raine said.

“Shut your vile mouth,” Lily Two replied. “Or I shall seal it with a gag.”

“Love to see you try, tough stuff. Wanna tie me up while we’re at it? I don’t make for a good captive, but you can sit on my face and —”

“Stop,” Evelyn grunted. “For fuck’s sake, Raine.”

Raine cracked a shit-eating grin. “Just a bit of friendly sparring.”

“Your friend there has better sense,” Lily Two said. “Better stop before she tugs your leash.”

“Actually I would be the one holding that,” I said gently, then cleared my throat. Why had I bothered to clarify that point?

“Ahem,” Lily One said. “The book, please. Hand it directly to Twillamina.” Lily One’s voice softened instantly as she turned to address Twil. “Twillamina, darling, sweetie, it’s perfectly safe, they won’t hurt you. We’re both right here.”

Evelyn held out the leatherbound tome. The raindrops swirled and misted beyond the pavilion, shivering the leaves and shaking the high branches of this dreamlike woodland. Twil crept forward with Lily One’s hand on her lower back. She eyed Evelyn for a long, long moment, then swallowed hard. She gently closed her fingers around the book, shaking worse than the twigs in the canopy above us.

Then she hopped back again, out of reach. She ran her hands over the cover, letting out a deep sigh of relief. She hugged the book to her chest, eyes fluttering shut.

“Oh, thank goodness,” she breathed.

“Hooray,” Lily Two deadpanned. “How much time does that buy us?”

Lily One sighed heavily and twirled a lock of golden blonde hair between her fingers. “While breaking role like this? Not enough.”

She clucked her tongue at us. “So, which one of you three clowns are we actually talking to? It can’t be all three of you, no way.”

“Clowns?” Raine purred, grinning dangerously.

“Buffoons,” Lily Two said. “Fools. Jokers. You’ve earned the title for this little stunt, if nothing else.”

Evelyn huffed and rolled her eyes. “Great. They’re still insufferable. I blame Twil. And no, I shan’t be using that ridiculous name for her.”

Twil opened her eyes and blinked at Evelyn. “Excuse me? Sorry, did I do something wrong?”

“Tch,” I tutted at the Lillies. “Yes, really, must you use language like that? I thought we had a truce now.”

Lily One folded her arms over her chest, cocked her hips to one side, and stuck her tongue into her cheek — a parody of a bad girl, acted by a young woman who never went to bed late, ate all her vegetables, and did her homework on time. There it was, clear as my own face in a mirror, that fake rough exterior wrapped around a core of honesty and kindness, the surface-level mean streets attitude over a girl who’d lived most of her life on a farm, in the woods.

Lily One, at least, was part of Twil.

Maybe I was wrong about them being something else. My deductions grew less clear with every passing moment.

“I don’t know about you three,” Lily One drawled. “But we do have to stay somewhat within our roles. Pardon the sneering disgust and the feelings of ... ” she trailed off, looking me up and down with a cocktail of pity and revulsion. “Aversion. It’s just the roles. No hard feelings.”

“Roles?” Evelyn grunted. “Explain.”

Lily Two said, “Roles. In the dream.”

Lily One sneered down at Evelyn. “Clearly you’re not the dreamer of the bunch.”

“You’re talking to all three of us,” I said, as politely as I could. “I’m lucid, I know what this is, and I know where I am. I know that none of this is real, that this is all a dream, or a play, metaphorically speaking. This is Evelyn. She’s lucid too. And this is Raine, she’s ...

semi-lucid. Sort of.”

“That’s me,” Raine purred, shooting the Lillies a cheeky wink. “Half-asleep and ready to rut.”

I sighed. Lily One wrinkled her nose. Lily Two looked like she wanted to spit at Raine’s feet.

Twil glanced between us as we spoke, wide-eyed but seemingly lost.

Evelyn snapped: “Is Twil keeping up with any of this?”

Twil herself just flinched, staring at Evelyn, blinking behind her huge glasses. “Excuse me?”

“Hahaha!” Lily One laughed with sneering contempt. “No, obviously not, duh!” She reached over and stroked the back of Twil’s head, smoothing her dark hair over her scalp. Twil made a happy little noise, blushing faintly in maidenly embarrassment. “If we let that happen, the dream-substrate would collapse. Twillamina will remember this as a friendly little chat, but the details aren’t going in. She’s as asleep as the rest of them.”

“Alright, so, we can talk,” I said. “I think we should establish our positions first.”

“Yes, quite,” Evelyn said. “We need to understand who or what we are addressing. Both of you are clearly lucid. I was working off the assumption that you’re parts of Twil, but—”

“We are,” said Lily Two.

Lily One sighed. “Sort of. It’s complicated. Go on, Saye.”

Evelyn frowned at the pair of Lillies. “But now I’m not so sure. You’re something else, aren’t you? You’re from outside this dream, you didn’t come in with us. Twil doesn’t have the kind of knowledge you’re displaying. What are you?”

“Woah woah woah,” Lily One said, raising a hand, smiling with sarcastic disbelief. “You first, sweetheart.”

“... ah,” Evelyn grunted. “I see.”

“Sorry?” I said. “Us first what? What do you want us to do? Eevee, you’re following this?”

“Mutual suspicion,” Evelyn grunted.

“Mexican stand-off!” Raine cheered. “My third favourite kind of stand-off.”

“We need you to prove what you are,” Lily One said. “As of right now, I’ve seen no compelling evidence that you’re not just another part of the dream. You need to prove to us that you’re real. Not just that you look the part of random crazies from inside the hospital.”

“Huh,” Lily Two grunted. “Good point. This could be tailor-made to expose us.”

I sighed a great big sigh and closed my eyes briefly. “I really have had enough of this place. Was our conversation with you yesterday not proof enough?”

“Don’t blame us, sweetheart!” Lily One said. “We’re taking a risk doing this too, you know? Give us something to work with. You can’t expect us to just go on trust alone, the stakes are too high for that.”

Raine purred, “I could fuck you both at the same time, how’s that for—”

Evelyn cleared her throat, a double-barrelled ahem-ahem to shut down Raine’s libido. The Lillies both looked down at her too. Twil followed, then blushed again and hid her lower face behind her big heavy book.

“We intervened in your board game,” Evelyn said. “Back in the dayroom.”

Lily One raised her eyebrows. “Oh?”

“Mmhmm,” Evelyn grunted. “You were losing the game, against Horror. Mostly because you were playing like morons. Strategy games are not Twil’s strongest skill, to put it lightly, which is why you were playing so poorly. We were right there, watching the end. I reached in while we were invisible, and re-arranged the pieces to buy you time, and maybe let you snatch victory from the jaws of defeat, if you’re not completely brain-dead.”

Lily One glanced at Lily Two, and said, “You’re meant to be the strategist.”

Lily Two shrugged. “Hard to think with only one lobe, don’t blame me.”

“Is that enough proof for you?” Evelyn drawled.

“Well,” Lily One said slowly, clearing her throat with a mockery of politeness. “That just proves you were acting within the dream, not anything else.”

“Here,” I said. “Look at this.”

I flipped the left side of my snug yellow blanket back over my shoulder, raised my left hand, and pulled back my sleeve.

The Fractal gleamed on my left forearm, marked out in the familiar black lines and angles. Raindrops shivered among the trees. The trunks creaked as if bending before high winds. Water splashed down off the roof, forming little pools on the earth just beyond the lip of concrete.

The Lillies stared.

Lily One said, “Dearest, do you see that?”

“I see it,” replied Lily Two. “But it means nothing.”

“Nothing? Are you joking? Has your reduction to this limited dream-form cut out four fifths of your brain?”

“Could be a trick.”

Lily One gestured at the Fractal. “This young woman has geospacial astral-cartographic magic tattooed on her body. I don’t think that’s possible to fake.”

“You lack caution,” Lily Two said.

I huffed. “Oh for crying out loud.” I pointed at the red plastic roof of the pavilion, at the sky beyond. “What do you see in the sky?”

Lily Two frowned, one eyebrow raised in a perfect little arch. Lily One blinked several times, making a curious little o-shape with her mouth. “Right back at you,” she said. “What do you see in the sky?”

“The Eye.”

The Lillies glanced at each other, both surprised.

“The Eye,” I repeated. “It’s the sky. But it’s like we’re inside it, or seeing it from behind, or something. There’s no split in the eyelid, no way for it to open. I can see it, and Evee can see it. Raine can’t. Not yet, anyway. How’s that?”

Lily One wet her lips, pushing me that final inch over the finishing line. “And what exactly is ‘the Eye?’”

“An Outsider god,” I said. “My name is Heather Morell, but I suspect you already know that. We’re here to rescue my twin sister, Maisie. She and I were kidnapped by the Eye ten years ago. I escaped. She didn’t.”

A flicker of horrified sympathy ghosted through Lily One’s expression. She put a hand to her mouth in shock. Lily Two dropped most of her aggression for a moment as well, brow creasing with recognition. She reached out with her free hand, toward the other Lily. They touched fingers briefly, then held on tight, holding on to each other.

Turned out I was right all along.

I went on. “The Eye has ... trained me, to some extent, in the use of hyperdimensional mathematics. You probably call it something else, but I’m willing to bet you’re the same. Because you’re the twins, aren’t you? We spoke with Professor Wilson Stout a little while ago, and he mentioned twins, twins who keep slipping in and out of Wonderland—”

“Wonderland!?” Lily One echoed. “Oh gods above, that’s what you call it?”

“Yes,” I huffed. “Please, concentrate on the subject. You’re the twins he mentioned, your reactions just now made it obvious. You were once taken by the Eye as well, weren’t you?”

Lily One let out a big sigh. She glanced at Lily Two — her twin sister, there was no doubt about that now — and nodded. Lily Two nodded back.

“Okay, I give in. You’re legit.”

Lily Two stuck her nightstick back inside her grey blazer. She broke the contact between the pair and folded her arms across her chest. “Fair enough.”

“Good,” I said. “Now, what are you? You’re obviously not just parts of Twil, but you’re also that? What’s going on here?”

Lily One rolled her eyes. “Again, right back at you. Look, sweetheart, Heather, we’re sympathetic to all this, it’s a bit ... a bit much. But what are you? You’re clearly not a dreamer, you’re barely treading water, let alone swimming. You're not even suited up properly. The dream is trying to chew you up because you're breaking all the rules, breaking the role assigned to you."

"I'm one seventh of something that used to be a human being," I said. "It's complicated. Like I said, I can do hyperdimensional mathematics. That's how all this got so messy."

"Huh," Lily Two grunted. "Figures."

"Human messes everywhere," said Lily One. "Why am I not surprised?"

Evelyn piped up, "I'm human. I'm a mage, but I'm human, and last I checked I'm no dreamer."

"Me neither," said Raine. "One hundred percent grade-A human being." She reached back and slapped her own rump.

Lily One snorted. Lily Two shook her head, and said, "As if."

"Look," I said before this could accelerate into an argument. "That's not important right now. We're lucid, you're lucid, that—"

"Temporarily," said Lily Two.

"Yes," said Lily One with a tight little sigh. "The more we deviate from the parameters of our hiding places, the more the dream is likely to react. We can't keep this up for too long or we'll dry out completely and have to leave, or the dream will send something to get rid of us. That's what Horror was doing earlier, I think. Trying to uproot us and throw us out. She knows, though she can't show it."

"Alright," I said, "so we need to talk quickly. What do you mean, hiding places?"

"We're party crashers," said Lily One with a mischievous little smile.

Lily Two said, "Invaders."

"Uninvited guests, I prefer."

"Viruses."

"Ew!" Lily one tutted. "Don't. Please."

Lily Two shrugged. "And we're hiding, like viruses do. Inside cells."

“Hiding inside aspects of Twil, yes?” Evelyn said.

Lily One nodded to Evelyn. “Correct, mage girl, well done! I like you better than stinky and annoying here,” she gestured at me and Raine in turn. “Yes. All of this, these mannerisms, this face, this body, these ... weird clothes.” She paused to flick at the end of her grey tie. “All of this is from Miss Twillamina here. These are parts of her. Well, one part of her.” Lily One cleared her throat. “We had to split it in two, to accommodate both of us.”

“Mmhmm,” Lily Two grunted.

“And you were already here?” I said. “Or you came in when we did? Why Twil, why pick her?”

Lily One sighed and rolled her eyes, then gave me a look like I was a very slow little fool. “We’re not native to this dream. We just turned up and hid inside the first vessel we could find.” She gestured at Twil. “Twillamina just so happened to have one lying around, separated from her body, trapped in here.” She tapped Twil’s leatherbound book. Twil pulled the book away slightly, as if confused. “We’re just piggybacking on that. It was easier than slipping into some other form. Like this, we can walk around the dream a little without getting chewed up and spat out right away. But we have to stay in character. At least when we’re around ... well, anybody who isn’t lucid. Certainly any of the nurses.”

“And you’re not human beings?” Evelyn asked.

“Correct! Do you want a prize for that one? Did I not make it blindingly obvious already?”

I said, “You don’t seem very alien.”

Lily One rolled her eyes again. “Because we’re hiding, duuuuh. Trust me, you three, this might make sense to you, but it’s complete nonsense to me and my dear sister here. When we turned up, it was like being plunged down to the bottom of the ocean, in the dark, surrounded by weird wriggling lifeforms. Ugh.” She stuck her tongue out. “These personalities you’re talking to, these are more like diving bells or dry suits. We’re just peering out of tiny windows in the front, squinting into the murk, communicating by waving our arms about. Deaf and dumb and with no sense of touch. You’re lucky you’re getting this much.”

“Is it ... uncomfortable?”

"Imagine being stuck in an antique diving suit for three days," Lily Two said. "Stewing in your own sweat and urine."

Lily One wrinkled her nose. "Ick!" She sighed. "You know, Heather, I would dearly love to talk to you sometime when we're not trapped in these roles. You're right, for the record. We were ... abducted, by the Eye, a long time ago. But we can't really have a proper conversation about that with these suits on." She flapped her arms. "It's ... exceedingly rare to survive the experience, as far as we can tell."

"Yeah," Lily Two snorted. "Love to. Nice little chat with our real faces on."

I sighed. "Don't sound too enthusiastic about it."

"I can't," she grunted at me, a sneer on her lips. "Lucidity has limits. I do actually want to, but this voice makes it sound like I'm being shitty at you."

"O-oh."

Evelyn said: "What are you both, really?"

Lily One sighed. "That's hard to explain, we—"

I cleared my throat, dug through my memories, and made an educated guess; I recalled the text from the library of Carcosa, the one which Heart had so faithfully translated for me — A full and true account of the disappearance and return of the twin sisters Jane Doe and Mary Doe, their subsequent alienation and alienism, their mathematical skills and strange habits, and their eventual transition into the weft between worlds. I tried to remember the names, as accurately as I could.

"Xiyuol'tok-al and Zalui'yel-tul," I said, then cringed. "I do apologise, I'm probably butchering your real names beyond recognition, but that's you two, isn't it?"

Both the Lillies stared at me for a moment, blank-faced and empty-eyed, as if their 'diving suits' had been briefly vacated.

Then Lily Two scrunched up her nose with absolute disgust. Lily One raised both hands so she could flap them in distress.

"Um," I said. "Was it—"

"Yes!" Lily One said, almost but not quite laughing. "Very bad!"

Urgh, oh, blegh.” She stuck her tongue out. “That was terrible, that was awful, just vile! Hearing those words — my name! — from a flapping meat-hole. Ugh. Oh that was disgusting.”

Lily Two said, “Please, never do that again.”

“Sorry!” I said, suddenly blushing. “Sorry, I was trying to be polite. Calling you Lily and Lily inside my head is getting a little ... disrespectful, that’s all. Was I at least close?”

“A very rough approximation, sure,” said Lily Two. “Our names, as pronounced under a lake of tar, through the trunk of an elephant.”

Raine chuckled. “Those are some real Doctor Xargle names. What are we talking to here, a pair of space aliens?”

Evelyn slapped Raine on the knee with one hand. “Don’t be rude.”

“Yes,” I added. “Please, I was just trying to be polite. Is there something you’d rather be called?”

Raine gestured at the twins. “So which one of you is Xiyu and which one is Zalu?”

The twins glanced at each other. Lily One pulled a face, but Two shrugged. “It would be better if they can tell us apart.”

“It’ll undermine the dream!”

“Not if it’s just between us.”

“Uuurghhh,” Lily One sighed. She turned back to us with a very unimpressed expression. “Alright, fine. But don’t use these names in front of the nurses or any other patients. I’m ... ‘Zalu’, and my sister here is ‘Xiyu’.”

Raine said, “And how do we pronounce those correctly, hey?”

Lily One — Zalu — rolled her eyes and threw back her mane of blonde hair again. “You don’t, homo sapiens. You need an entirely different vocal setup. And don’t bother trying to remember what we look like. These faces are just Twillamina. If we ever meet again, we won’t look anything like this. In fact, you’ll probably foul your underclothes and scream your head off.”

Raine cracked a grin. “Wanna bet? If I win, I’m gonna slap your pert little alien backside, for real.”

“What do you look like normally?” I asked quickly, to short-circuit any future interdimensional incidents.

“Bigger,” said Lily Two — Xiyu. She smiled, thin and tight and dangerous.

“Niiiiiiiice,” Raine purred.

The twins both rolled their eyes at Raine; I didn’t blame them.

Twil followed this entire exchange as if she was listening to her ‘lovers’ debating the state of the weather or what we were all going to have at the next tea party. Her eyes seemed detached and dream-like. None of this was going in, the twins had been honest about that part.

“And you,” Zalu said, pointing a finger at me. “You know about us, somehow. I take it that means you’re the one who dropped all the loose change?”

I blinked at her, utterly bewildered. “The what, pardon me?”

“The loose change! That’s what brought us here in the first place. We don’t generally make a habit of randomly taking a stroll in ‘Wonderland’.” She made air-quotes with her fingers. “We only turned up because of all the racket. We assumed it was, well, somebody a bit more like us, in trouble. Which, I guess you are.”

“I’m sorry,” I said. “But I have no idea what you’re talking about.”

Zalu rolled her eyes and raised her right hand. She flicked her fingers as if doing a magic trick. Then she held her hand out to me, and opened her fist.

A greenish soapstone coin sat in the middle of her palm, shaped like a five-pointed star.

“Yours?” she said.

My wide eyes told her everything she needed to know. She gestured to Xiyu — her sister, her bud-mate, her twin. Xiyu produced a matching soapstone coin with a flicker of her fingers, holding it up to show me.

“Huh,” Evelyn grunted. “That explains one thing, and opens about a dozen more questions. None of which we have time for.”

“Yes!” I said. “Those are mine. Well, sort of. I was carrying them with me when we went to Wonderland. I assumed they'd gotten lost in the dream like everything else. Where did you get them?"

"I told you," Zalu huffed. "We heard them clattering all over the floor, making such an awful racket. We thought one of our kind was in trouble ... though, well, it's been a while, to put it lightly. That's why we came running! And then we found all this nonsense." She gestured vaguely at the sky, the dream, everything. "Better question, where did you get these? Random humans running around with currency is very weird. Like finding a possum with a wallet."

"Oh, um," I tried to gather myself, casting my mind far, far back. "One of them we found on a corpse, Outside. The other was a gift from an Outsider, called Hringewindla, though that probably won't mean anything to you."

"Huh," Xiyu grunted. "Ghoulish, but valid enough. They're hers, legitimate like."

"Tch," Zalu tutted. She held the coin out to me. "Well go on, take it. It's yours, by rights."

I gingerly plucked the coin from her outstretched hand; she cringed at the touch of my skin and then wiped her palm on her skirt, trying not to grimace. Xiyu stepped forward and dropped her coin into my palm, to avoid touching me.

"What do they do?" I asked, staring at the coins. "What are they? I've been carrying them around all this time, without knowing."

"I already told you, they're loose change!" Zalu sighed. "Evelyn here has a better head on her shoulders than you, Heather, my God. We can't afford all these questions right now, we're running out of time. If we meet again one day, without these meat-suits on, maybe you and we can have a proper conversation. Hopefully with your twin sister at your side. Good luck with that, I mean it." Zalu tried to smile for me, but it came off like a catty girl pretending she didn't hate me. "But if you're going to have any hope of unravelling this dream and plucking her from the Eye, we have to stop wandering around like a bunch of lemons and get a move on."

"Hear hear," Evelyn muttered.

I tutted softly — it was good advice, but the Lillies had such irritating personalities. Were these really parts of Twil, parts of her mind? She was never like this. How much of this attitude was Twil, and how much was the alien twins from Outside?

“Fine,” I said. “I agree. But how do we do that? How do we combat the dream itself?”

Zalu folded her arms over her chest. “We assumed you had a plan! That riot yesterday, that was part of it, wasn’t it?”

“Yeah,” Raine confirmed. “We’re gonna pull down the prison walls. Take over the hospital, overthrow the staff — the security is already secretly with us, but they can’t declare openly yet. Lizzie, the one who started yesterday’s riot, she’s with us too. We’re gonna crack this place wide open.”

“And then break into the secure wing,” I added. “I’m pretty sure that’s where they’re keeping my twin sister. And maybe other things too, parts of me. Probably.”

Zalu sighed. Xiyu shrugged.

“You don’t think that’ll work?” I asked.

Xiyu shrugged again. “Normally we don’t have to think about stuff like this at all. This whole place is absurd. And we can barely see it, remember?”

Evelyn cleared her throat. “Do you have time for a quick, seemingly off-topic question? I assure you, it matters.”

“No,” said Zalu. “But ask away, I suppose.”

“You’ve met humans before? Where? Have you been to Earth?”

Zalu blinked down at Evelyn in girlish surprise. “Is that where you’re from?” She put a hand to her mouth in shock. “Oh my gosh, no wonder you’ve messed this place up so badly.”

“That would be my fault,” I said. “I’m the one who did this, sort of. With some help. Look, that’s a long story, and there’s too many factors involved to explain quickly. You two are the only second opinion we can get in this place, the only experienced dreamers. Do you think tearing down the institution will work, or not? Are we on the right track?”

The twins shared a long, lingering look. Twil followed them, looking back and forth between their faces as if listening to a silent conversation.

Then, to everyone's surprise, Twil spoke up.

"I ... I don't think it's a good idea," Twil said slowly, so gentle and timid, shrinking behind her glasses, clutching her religious tome to her chest, arms wrapped tight and secure around the leather cover. The caged werewolf peeked out from between her arms. "I don't think it's a good idea to break the rules. We might all get punished. I don't want to be punished. It's frightening."

Zalu reached for Twil's hand. Xiyu stepped closer, to touch Twil's shoulder.

Before they could make contact, Evelyn said: "Twil. Look at me. What are you afraid of?"

Twil blinked behind her massive round lenses. She stared at Evee, then blushed faintly, frowning with confusion. "You ... 'Evelyn'," she said the name so carefully that I could almost hear the quotes. "You claimed that I have ... c-carnal knowledge of you, but—"

"You do," Evelyn said. She was completely unembarrassed. "You just don't remember it right now. Twil, you don't have to compartmentalize yourself in front of me. Or in front of Heather. Or Raine. Or anybody. You are your entire self. Stop hiding."

Twil raised the book to cover her chin and mouth and nose, amber eyes peeking out over the top.

Raine snorted. "Was that your grand plan to crack her psyche open?"

To my surprise, Evelyn didn't snarl with anger or frustration, she just held Twil's gaze. "No. Those are my honest feelings."

"E-Evee?" I said. "Are you okay?"

"No. Next question."

"Twillamina does have a point," Zalu said. "At least like this you're all relatively safe. What happens if you fail, if you get captured, or this escalating series of riots doesn't work? You really think a rag-tag group of revolutionaries out in the woods can bring down an institution that, as far as we can tell, represents the Eye itself?"

"Oh!" I said. "Actually the Eye has pretty direct representation, weirdly enough."

The Lillies both blinked at me. "Pardon?"

“Yeah,” Raine added. “And she’s a total gilf smoke show. Eleven out of ten. Spicy granny. Trust me.”

The twins looked at Raine like she was mad.

“The Governor,” I explained with a little sigh. “We saw her earlier. I’m pretty sure she’s a direct representation of the Eye. If we can somehow communicate with her, possibly after gaining control of the building itself or the institution as a whole, then ... maybe anything is possible.”

Zalu just blinked, wide-eyed and tight-jawed, making it clear that she thought we were all completely bonkers. Xiyu blew out a long, slow breath, glancing off into the woods, checking our perimeter.

Evelyn said, “And for that, we need Twil lucid. She’s one of our aces. In case you two didn’t work this out yet, she’s a werewolf. If she transforms, no number of nurses could stand against her. We need her back with us.”

Zalu rolled her eyes and put a protective hand on Twil’s shoulder. “And you think her going all ‘Werewolf of Brinkwood’ isn’t going to bring the self-correcting mechanisms of the dream crashing down on her?”

Evelyn frowned. “How do you know the name Brinkwood?”

Xiyu pointed a finger at Twil’s head. “From her, obviously.”

“Look around,” Zalu continued. “Look at the internal logic of this place! A werewolf, here? The dream will react, and it will send something to crush her.”

Zalu drew Twil back slightly, away from us. Xiyu moved closer, as if shielding Twil with her own body.

Evelyn snapped: “Why do you two care? You don’t even know her.”

Zalu sighed. “We don’t care. I don’t care — me, the real me, does not care. But these personalities do.” She gestured at herself and her sister. “They care, they’re part of Twil, and they’re trying to protect her. We can’t act with true independence, I keep telling you that. We’re constrained by our roles, and our roles are to protect Twil’s vulnerable core.”

Xiyu said, “If we stop protecting her, we’ll lose our cover completely. They’ll go back to being part of her.”

Evelyn slapped the arm of her wheelchair. “Then you need to give them back. Let her protect herself!”

Twil cowered from the sudden shouting, uncomfortable and afraid. She squeezed her eyes shut. The Lilies closed ranks as she shrank behind them.

“She’s not yours!” Evelyn snapped.

“Wait, wait, Evee,” I said, stepping forward. “They’re not claiming her, they’re parts of her. We’re still talking to Twil. We’ve been talking to her this whole time. Isn’t that correct?”

“Bingo,” said Zalu. “Remember, humans, we’re just along for the ride. You’ve gotta work this mess out between yourselves. All we’re doing is carrying on in the role Twillamina wants for us. She knows on some level that the dream will crush her if she reassumes her full self. The nature of this dream cannot bear a werewolf — it can’t even bear a little riot.”

“No,” I said.

Everyone looked at me, at the certainty in my voice.

But I had eyes only for Twil.

She stared back at me over the cover of her leatherbound book, her face framed from below by that illustration of a caged werewolf upon the cover.

“She’s invincible,” I said. “Twil, if you remember nothing else, remember that. You’re invincible. You’re unstoppable. I’ve seen you shrug off knife wounds and broken bones. I’ve seen you tossed against walls by supernatural force, then get up again and get back into a fight without so much as a limp. Your flesh regenerates faster than it can be wounded. You’re one of the strongest people I know. And you’re invincible.”

Twil stared at me, wide eyed, caught in bewildered horror. Slowly, she said, “I’m ... I’m sorry, but I’m not your kind of crazy.”

“I’ve had enough of hearing that line since we arrived here,” I said. “I don’t care. You’re still invincible.”

Twil started to cry, slow tears leaking from behind her glasses. Her face scrunched up. “I’m not. I’m not, I’m just hiding. It’s all I can do —”

"You could beat every nurse in this place ten times over, Twil!" I said, spreading my yellow blanket out to either side. My left leg throbbed, but I did my best to ignore the pain and the stiff muscles. "You could kill every nurse, every doctor, and win the riot for us, single handed!"

"I— I can't!" she wailed. "I need to stay down, I need to keep my head down, it's the only— the only way to be safe!" She shook her head, but she couldn't take her eyes off me.

"Keep pushing," Evelyn hissed from behind me. "Keep pushing her, Heather."

"No," I said to Twil. "There's no safety in keeping your head down. That's always the biggest lie they tell us, the lie everything else depends on. Keep quiet, don't speak up for yourself, stay out of sight, all that rubbish. They tell us that lie to keep us docile, to keep us separate, to stop us from finding each other. And it doesn't work. It doesn't keep you safe."

"It— it does—" Twil sobbed. "It does, I was safe, I was—"

"Not for long," I said. "That's the lie. They tell you to toe the line, to do as you're told, to be a good girl. But they'll come for you in the end too, and you don't even have to do anything wrong to provoke it. That's what was happening to you back there, back in the dayroom, with that board game."

Twil blinked at me, bewildered, but not quite faking it well enough to convince herself.

I pointed at the Lillies; they seemed paralysed, paused against the background of the swirling rainy mist. "They knew it, so you must know it too, on some level. Horror was cornering you, peeling away your protection. And it didn't matter that you'd been a good girl and followed all the rules and kept your head down. It's a lie, Twil. It's a lie to keep you under control."

"N-no, it ... "

"You're invincible," I repeated one final time. I could feel her wavering, about to break. "And you know what else? You could have leapt across that table and pulled Horror's head clean off her shoulders, without even breaking a sweat."

Tears were running down Twil's cheeks as she stared at me. Amber eyes glistened with reflections of the rain-streaked light.

I smiled and held out a hand. “Twil, you’re one of us. And you are exactly my kind of crazy.”

Twil swallowed, throat bobbing. Her lips parted with a quiver. She panted, as if building herself up to something new. “I— I think I know you. You’re—”

A bright and bubbly voice broke across the clearing, sweeping beneath the pavilion like a gust of stormy wind.

“What’s this about pulling off my head?”

We all whirled — me with my yellow blanket clutched tight and a hiccup caught in my throat, Raine swinging her machete upward to meet this new and sudden threat; Xiyu pulling her nightstick from inside her uniform as Zalu stepped in front of Twil, arms wide to protect her vulnerable core self. Evelyn leaned forward in her wheelchair, turning pale and wide-eyed. Even Praem peeked out from inside Evelyn’s dressing gown, her eyes nothing but flat circles of white fabric.

A familiar nurse stood at the edge of the clearing, right at the tree line, holding an umbrella against the misty raindrops, white uniform half-hidden beneath a puffy raincoat. Her blonde hair was pinned up behind her head. A sickly-sweet smile split across her face.

“Hello there, girls,” said Horror. “Didn’t you know? It’s the height of bad manners to talk about a person behind their back. Now, once again, with less gormless gaping this time, please. What’s all this about pulling off my head?”

bedlam boundary – 24.19

Horror stepped from the tree line and walked into the clearing.

Each footfall was neatly measured, drawing subtle squeaks of damp wood from the spongy carpet of sodden wood chips, accompanied by a subtle brush of polyester moving across cloth, the sound of her puffy raincoat rubbing against her nurse's uniform. Drizzle and mist glazed the canvas of her black umbrella with a sheen of moisture, while thick droplets gathered and hung from the tips of the metal spokes. Her stride shook the droplets loose, falling to the wood chips as fat, wet, glistening globs, like mucus from the mouth of some unknowable Outsider.

The hazy grey light of the rainy day grew dim and dark as she approached, throwing deep shadows across the clearing and beneath the roof of the pavilion, as if heavy clouds moved to obscure the non-existent sun in the empty sky. For there was no sun, no sky, no clouds, only the wrinkled surface of the Eye stretching from horizon to horizon. Yet still the darkness thickened with Horror's every step. The trees seemed suddenly taller, closing off the ring of open space above our heads, swelling inward with undergrowth to choke the passages between the trunks. The woods extended skeletal branches to form a thick and thorny wall, the paths leading out erased by time and weather. Cold air wormed invasive fingers beneath my yellow blanket. Real raindrops replaced the swirling mist, falling with a drumming patter upon the pavilion roof and spattering off Horror's umbrella.

Horror walked right up to the pavilion's concrete foundation, then stopped.

Sound came rushing back — the drip-drip-drip of rainwater running from the red plastic roof, the rushing of wind through the tree trunks, the creaking of branches and the rustle of leaves overhead.

Horror smiled, cheeks plump and rosy with false warmth.

"Are you girls going to make me repeat myself a third time?" she said. "Because I really don't like having to do that. You've all got working ears, none of you are deaf. I know that for a fact, seeing as I've known you all for the entire duration of your stay at Cygnet. I've known all of you since your very first day here, since you walked through those doors and joined us in the hospital. So I'm well aware that you're being obstinate, choosing not to answer my perfectly reasonable question. Isn't that right?"

Evelyn hissed between her teeth, "Don't answer her."

Twil was gaping at the woods, at the thickened tree line, at the sudden darkening of the light and deepening of the storm. "W-what's happening to the woods?" she said. "What's happening!?"

I grabbed the handles of Evelyn's wheelchair and pulled her backward, retreating a few paces from Horror's position; the benches and the empty fire pit stood as a bulwark between us, but I trusted nothing in the dream when it came to Horror. She had survived the King in Yellow. Wooden benches would not stop her, if the logic of the dream bent her way.

"Raine!" I snapped. "Raine, back away from her! Zalu, Xiyu, you as well! Bring Twil, over here, now!"

Zalu shook her head, eyes locked with Horror's too-sweet gaze. "I think it's a bit too late to resume our hiding places."

Xiyu raised her nightstick in one white-knuckled fist. "She was listening to us. To us, for real."

"Rumbled," Zalu sighed. "How very tiresome."

"Quite!" said Horror, dropping ninety five percent of her smile. "It's no use running away over and over. You girls can't live out here in the woods, and you can't get over the outside wall, not without seriously injuring yourselves in the process, and none of us want that. Running away merely delays the inevitable. Are you really going to make me trudge back and forth across the hospital grounds, just to end up in the same place? It's very tiring and I'm going to get worn out. Think of my poor feet. I'm not so different to you, I'm just a nurse, doing my job."

Raine smirked. "I can think of a much better way to get you all sweaty and breathless. You and me, one on one, we can make a much better afternoon of it. What do you say?"

I almost tutted, but I restrained my ire; Raine had made a good point earlier about breaking down Horror's facade, whatever she really was.

Not that I didn't doubt the truth of Raine's offer.

Horror sighed and rolled her eyes, but not without a touch of colour in her cheeks and a tiny smile on her lips. "Raine, isn't it? From the high security wing, yes? I know you're of age, but there's still an unfortunate power differential between you and I. Even if I did have a personal interest in your dubious advances, that would break so many rules of good conduct. They'd throw me at a tribunal so fast my head would spin. So, no, I shan't be having illicit sexual relations with a resident or a patient. Besides, you would need about three baths first, a medical examination, a course of inoculations, some antibiotics, and probably a course of de-worming pills."

Raine chuckled. "Yeah, thought so. Pity. I'd prefer it go down that way, instead of like this." She raised her machete and pointed at Horror. "I was gonna get all up in your guts, but now I'm just gonna gut you."

"Raine!" I hissed. "Get to the wheelchair, now, touch it so we can go! Raine, we need to hide, we—"

"We can't," said Evelyn, her voice stretched razor thin, like a piano wire about to snap.

"... Evee?"

"I've been attempting to use the Fadestone since the first step she took toward us," Evelyn hissed. "And I can't. I can't. I can't calm myself. I can't not panic. She's doing this to us somehow. I can't use it. I'm ... fuck!" she hissed. "I'm too afraid!"

Horror smiled at Evelyn. "Sometimes fear is a sensible reaction, Miss Saye. Fear keeps us alive, don't you know? There's no point in running, not from me, and not from matricide."

"Fuck you!" Evelyn spat.

"Tch," Horror tutted. "Murder is a very serious crime. I'm disappointed that you don't show more guilt. A young woman like you, with extenuating circumstances, with reasons and motivations with which any jury would sympathise, with your disabilities and your situation, not to mention your father's financial resources and legal connections ... well, let's just say you would have a pretty good chance of a lenient sentence, if only you showed any real remorse.” Horror sighed, smiling with toxic melancholy. “What a pity you chose to destroy your own life.”

“Ha!” Evelyn barked, though I heard the strain in her voice. “Getting your facts mixed up, aren’t you?”

Horror frowned, miming a mask of gentle sympathy. “Excuse me?”

“Evee’s right,” I said out loud. “You’re not talking about what happened yesterday, you’re talking about reality, the real reality, the real world, not here. Evee killed her own mother, in reality, yes. But here, in Cygnet? She wasn’t the one who killed her mother. I killed Loretta Saye. I beat her to death with my bare hands, somehow, which is completely ridiculous because I’m not certain I would have the basic physical strength to do that, not without the rest of me. Evee was strapped into that horrible chair through the whole thing. She had no hand in it. It was me.”

Horror sighed with great concern, her frown turning pained and difficult. “Oh, Heather,” she said. “You were always such a good girl. You were on the path to a real recovery. And now you’re so confused. You’re off your medication, running around in the woods with a convicted murderer and a will-be convicted murderer. Raine treats girls like you as meat. I’m not sure what Evelyn has planned for you, but it can’t be healthy. Oh, Heather, Heather Heather Heather. There’s still a way back, for you. Myself and the staff can testify that you weren’t involved—”

“No deal,” I said. “Not ever. Just stop trying. I’m wide awake.”

Horror sighed again and shook her head. Then she turned her eyes to Twil. “And you, Twillamina. I am very surprised by your involvement in this incident.”

Twil was half-hiding behind Zalu, her big amber eyes peeking over the crisp white shoulder of Zalu’s shirt. She was clutching her book to her chest so tightly that her arms shook.

“I-I-I-I’m sorry?” she stammered. “Nurse? W-what did I do wrong?”

“Nothing,” Zalu hissed over her shoulder. “You did nothing wrong.”

Horror smiled and shook her head. “I don’t know, Twillamina. All I know is that you’re out here in the woods, mixed up in all this, associating with these three deviants and criminals. It’s not where you belong.”

“It’s exactly where she belongs!” I shouted.

Twil’s face contorted with frantic denial. “They stole my book! They took my book, I only followed them to get it back! I only—”

Horror interrupted. “And yet here you are, alongside them. Guilt by association, I’m afraid. This will all have to be untangled, at the very least. I suspect some serious punishment is in order for you, Twillamina. You strayed from the safe path through the woods. It’s your own fault you got bitten by the big bad wolf.”

“N-no ... no ... ” Twil whimpered. “I didn’t do anything ... I didn’t ... ”

“Twil!” I hissed. “Don’t listen to her, she’s lying! She’s trying to rattle you!”

Zalu nodded. “Yes, it’s all lies, darling. You’ve done nothing wrong. You are perfect as you are, I promise you. Nobody who disagrees is worth your time. This woman is rubbish. Her words are nonsense.”

Horror smiled that sickly-sweet know-better smile. “You should stop listening to your friends with such loyalty, Twillamina. They’re the ones who’ve led you astray.”

Xiyu stepped forward, nightstick clutched in her right hand, eyes narrow and level. “Shut your lying turd-streaked mouth.”

Horror blinked several times, free hand rising to her throat, miming mock-offence. “There’s no need to be so rude, Lily.” She paused to smile with sarcastic discomfort. “If Lily is indeed your real name.”

Zalu clenched her teeth. “Damn.”

“Damn, indeed,” Horror echoed, turning an unimpressed frown on Zalu and Xiyu. “You two are in an awful lot of trouble as well. Faked identities, false records, made-up backgrounds. You two aren’t remotely who you’re pretending to be, are you?” Horror drew a sharp breath between her teeth. “We’re going to have to contact your parents or guardians, get this all straightened out, and have the truth from both of you. But I’m afraid you won’t be staying at Cygnet any longer after this little stunt. We can hardly let you return to the way things were before, even under your real identities.”

Xiyu huffed. “Nice metaphor. Not.”

I said, “Has she ... discovered you, for real?”

Zalu sighed, “I think so.”

“There’s nothing metaphorical about it!” Horror snapped. “You two have committed forgery, perjury, and God alone knows what else. That’s right, Twillamina. Your best friends are not who they appear to be. I don’t know why they’ve attached themselves to you, but it’s time to say goodbye to them. Permanently.”

“What?!” Twil’s eyes bulged with panic. She grabbed the back of Zalu’s shirt. “No! No, you can’t, you can’t—”

“We’re not going anywhere, Twillamina,” Zalu said over her shoulder. “I told you, we’ll always be with you, we can’t be separated. We might just ... lose some outside help.”

Evelyn hissed between her teeth, “If that’s meant to be a pun, this is not the fucking time.”

“Not an intentional one, no,” Zalu said.

Horror produced a cell phone from inside a pocket of her puffy white coat. She held it in one hand and tapped at the screen with her thumb. “Now, I’m going to start by calling security to come round you all up. You girls aren’t going to drag this out by running away again, are you? I hope you’re going to ... make ... this ... hm?”

Horror frowned down at the screen, her face lit from below by a sickly blue glow. Behind her, framed between the white shoulders of her coat and the black rim of her dripping umbrella, the woods seemed to thicken further, their trunks pressed so tightly that not a scrap of light slipped between them. Overhead, the sky darkened again, turning almost black with the threat of a real storm. The raindrops intensified, pouring down in a heavy drumming wave, little droplets bouncing off the umbrella and dancing amid the wood chips around the pavilion.

My heart climbed into my throat. “No phone signal.”

Horror looked up at me; for the first time since I’d arrived here in this insulting, degrading, oppressive dream, the face of the nightmare wore a frown of confusion and anxiety.

"I'm right, aren't I?" I said. "Your phone doesn't have any signal. Does it?"

Horror glanced over her shoulder at the trees, at the wall of twigs and thorns, then back down at her phone screen. She frowned harder, biting her lower lip. Her whole body hesitated, as if she wanted to take a step back, away from us.

"Heather?" Evelyn hissed. "What's happening?"

"Yeah, sweet thing," Raine purred. "Clue us in, 'cos this is getting real spooky."

"It's the logic of the dream," I said. "We mentioned it earlier, but now it's really happening. Horror is a nurse, alone in the woods, confronting a group of murderers and imposters. The nature of the play, the dream, whatever, it's reacting. She, this, whatever it is all, she's vulnerable. The narrative logic has made her vulnerable."

"Don't be so sure," said Zalu. "You're no dreamer, human. The dream has been disrupted, yes, but that's just as likely to be a product of her overhearing us earlier. Our presence, me and my sister, it's breaking the dream substrate, tainting it. This might just be our fault, not an opening."

Horror raised her eyes. She seemed perfectly calm once again. She sighed and slipped her phone back into her pocket.

"Evee," I hissed. "You're sure we can't escape? You can't use the Fadestone?"

"I've been trying to this entire time!" she hissed back. "The conditions of the dream have changed. Maybe only here. Whatever happens, we're locked into this for now."

"No hiding from this," Xiyu said.

Raine grinned, rolled her neck from side to side, and swapped her machete from right hand to left, then back again, then again.

"Ohhhh yeah," she purred. "You know what this means? I think it's time for a spot of good old ultra-violence."

Xiyu snorted. "Agreed."

"Raine!" I hissed. "Be careful! Please!"

"This is our chance, isn't it?" Raine purred, then looked back at me and winked. "You said it yourself. She's trapped, lost in the woods."

The logic of the dream and all that, closing in on her. Time to get all slasher movie. You may not wanna watch this part, sweet thing.”

I swallowed, sweat beading on my forehead. Evee snorted, and said, “Yes, I’d rather not see this, thank you.”

“Ahem,” Horror said out loud. “I think you won’t find me as easily gotten rid of as you might prefer.”

Horror reached into her coat again and pulled out a short black baton, with a button in the handle and a length of naked steel at the end — a stun-gun, shaped like a cattle prod. She thumbed the button. The weapon emitted a loud electric click-click-click-click. Blue sparks of electrical power arced across the exposed metal tip. Raindrops sizzled and burst against the crackling halo.

“A young lady like myself does have to think about matters of self defence, after all,” she said. “Especially in my line of work, spending my days among so many troubled girls. One never knows when a patient might turn violent, or become obsessed with a member of staff. Crazy people are unpredictable, after all.”

“Oh please,” I hissed. “You’re such a stereotype. Worse than a stereotype!”

Raine grinned wider, eyes alight with pleasure. “Oh yeah. Ooooh yeah, babe. You think you can hit me with that before I run you through?” She brandished her machete. “I’ll bottom out against your spine before you can even land a kiss on my forearm.”

“Raine,” I tutted. “Does this have to be so ... ”

“Weird,” Xiyu sighed.

Horror smiled back, sweet and pretty. “I’m quite adept at taking care of myself. And I’ve already rejected your advances. No, thank you. I’m sorry.”

Raine glanced at Xiyu. “You go right, I’ll go left. No mercy. Take her as quick as we can.”

“No problem with that,” Xiyu replied. “No playing.”

Raine nodded. “No playing. For real.”

“Oh my— hic— gosh,” I hissed. “Raine, be care—”

But then Raine was off, darting across the pavilion’s concrete floor like a hound who'd slipped her leash. She raced around the flimsy bulwark of the benches, looping around to Horror's left. Xiyu went to the right, vaulting the benches in a single leap, grey skirt and transparent raincoat flapping as she landed. The two of them converged on Horror in a pincer movement, bursting out into the rain to take her from both sides. Xiyu wound back her nightstick to cave in Horror's skull; Raine tucked her machete low, to pierce Horror beneath the ribs and straight up into her heart.

Horror raised her stun gun in one hand and twirled her umbrella in the other.

Xiyu's nightstick bounced off the stem of the umbrella as if she'd slammed it into a brick wall. The impact jarred all the way up her arm, drawing a scream of pain from her lips. The rebound threw her backward. She dropped her weapon from numb fingers, stumbling over and crashing down into the sodden wood chips and waterlogged mud.

Raine's machete slid past Horror's guard — Raine was an experienced killer, after all. I'd seen her do this sort of thing over and over again, in a dozen different situations, and she always had a trick up her sleeve, powered by the sheer exuberance she took in fighting and winning. Horror might be playing by a bent and broken set of rules, but Raine was still Raine, even in a dream.

I winced, intending to look away at the last second. I may have enjoyed Raine's style and confidence, the way she looked when she enacted such violence, but I didn't want to watch her end a person's life, even a metaphorical person who represented the worst excesses of the medical system.

But then Horror's stun gun touched Raine's sternum with an almighty crack of electrical discharge.

I didn't see how it was possible; Horror's arms were at the wrong angle. Raine was already too close, moving too fast. Horror should have been run through with the machete before she could even touch Raine.

Instead, Raine was thrown backward with a spasm of involuntary muscle contraction and a sharp yell of pain. She held onto her machete, but she fell over on her backside with a splash, landing amid the mud and rainwater pooling at the edge of the pavilion's concrete foundation. Panting and hissing, grunting through her teeth, clothes soaked through in seconds, she glared upward at Horror.

“Ah ah ha,” said Horror. “Experience beats youth, every single time.”

Raine hopped to her feet, grinning back with sudden relish. “Hit me again, fuck-pig.”

Xiyu was more cautious. She climbed to her feet, grabbed her nightstick, and backed away. “She’s not playing by the rules. We can’t brute force this. We got something wrong. Something isn’t right.”

But Raine wasn’t listening. She threw herself at Horror again, a mad grin ripping across her face.

Horror repelled Raine with her stun gun three more times — crack! ping! zzzzzap! Raine kept her feet after that first tumble, whirling away with muscle convulsions, grunting and hissing through clenched teeth, squinting through the pain of brief, sharp, nasty electric shocks. On the second attempt, Xiyu darted back in as well, trying to distract Horror to buy Raine that crucial second she needed to stick a knife into the nurse’s guts. But Xiyu was thrown backward again too, tossed aside by the umbrella as if she had attacked a brick wall.

On the third try, Raine reeled away, sagging with exhaustion from the repeated shocks and muscle convulsions. Rainwater stuck her hair flat to her scalp, soaking her clothes, running off her hands and the blade of her machete. Horror regarded her with unimpressed amusement, nice and dry beneath her umbrella.

“I told you, there’s no sense in this struggle,” said Horror. “You are far weaker than you believe, and you cannot change the course of your friend’s lives.”

“Raine, stop!” I cried out. “Come back! You can’t keep taking electrical shocks like that!”

Raine didn’t move. She stared at Horror with a look I’d never seen on her face before — cold rage without expression.

Xiyu retreated back beneath the cover of the pavilion roof, her immaculate grey school uniform wet and dirty from where she’d fallen, barely protected by the transparent raincoat. “We’ve got it all wrong," she muttered. "This isn't right."

Zalu agreed: "Quite, sister, this isn't working."

"I can take her," said Raine. "I can take her. Nobody can fight forever."

"Exactly!" I called out. "Raine, we've got this all wrong, this isn't right! It's not working! Come back over here!"

Horror took a step toward the pavilion, ignoring Raine. "I think we've had quite enough of this, girls. It's time to bring this silly little episode to an end."

Raine went for her again, ducking low and switching her machete from one hand to the other at the last second. But there was Horror's stun gun, the same as every time before, jabbing into the soft flesh of Raine's belly. Zzzzt-crack! Raine reeled backward, her free arm over her stomach, staggering back under the cover of the pavilion. She twitched and flailed with her machete, as if trying to ward Horror off.

"Raine, retreat!" I ordered. "Right now! Come here! Here, right now! Bad girl!"

Raine did as I ordered, retreating toward myself and Evelyn, but she bared her teeth and narrowed her eyes at Horror, pointing with her machete. "Cheater."

"Raine, Raine, here, here," I reached out and ran my hand over her slick-wet hair. "Good girl, good girl, you did really good. Stay, stay here, stay by me. Good girl."

Horror stepped forward again, alighting upon the concrete of the pavilion foundations with a smart little click-click of her shoes, finally out from beneath the pouring rain. The shadows of the pavilion threw her face into deep shade, as if her skin was a wooden mask over a void. She lowered her umbrella and slowly shook the water off the canvas.

"If you won't come peacefully," she said. "We can arrange for this to be much harder, even without security to assist me."

"Heather," Raine hissed, taking deep breaths in her shock-induced exhaustion. "We need another miracle."

"No," Zalu said. "We need to run. I have to protect Twillamina."

She had Twil's hand gripped tightly in her own, twisting and turning to look at the tree line, searching for a way out. "Can't we cut a way out through the plants? There has to be a way out of here!"

"Heather," Raine hissed again. "We need something, fast."

"I ... I don't know what to do!" I said. "The King in Yellow won't come a second time. We need— we need—"

"A horror movie monster," grunted Evelyn.

Everyone stopped panicking and looked at her — even Horror herself, oddly enough.

Evelyn gestured with her chin. "Look around us. Look at the light, the woods, the trees, all of it. Feel the wind, the cold. Listen to this absurd atmosphere. The dream has changed, that's true enough. But it's not enough to cut this avatar of the dream down with a knife. Heather, you never thought of Raine as a monster. And you." She gestured at Xiyu. "You're in disguise, you don't count. We're inside the logic of a horror movie, or maybe a nightmare. We need an appropriate monster."

Evelyn stopped talking and looked directly at Twil.

"You're up, my beloved mongrel," she said.

Twil gaped in shock, still lost too deep in the dream. "I— b-beloved?! What?!"

"Yes!" I said. "That's right! We need Twil awake, we need her lucid! Zalu, Xiyu, can you ... ?"

The sisters, the Lillies, the plant-girl Outsiders from so far beyond Earth's sphere that even their language had been an almost impossible challenge to translate, glanced at each other with a knowing double-look.

Zalu took a deep breath, and said, "We'll only get one shot at this. And it won't work."

"We won't win," Xiyu grunted, but she backed toward her sister.

"We could buy them time!" Zalu said. "That's not nothing. Not in this situation."

"And leave Twillamina unprotected?" Xiyu stopped next to her sister, facing toward Horror. She slipped her nightstick up inside her grey uniform blazer, then flexed her empty hands.

"This is her best shot," Zalu said. "And that's not just me speaking. You know it too, sister. We need to high-tail it out."

"Mm," Xiyu grunted. "Okay."

Horror cleared her throat, loudly and clearly. "Whatever silly little games you're talking about, they won't help you now." She finished shaking off her umbrella and closed it up, then wrapped the fabric tight, pinning it shut with a strip of velcro. Once she was done, she held it like a walking stick, metal tip against the concrete floor, stun gun in her opposite hand. "I suggest you two come along. Make this easy on yourselves, and easy on me, too. Once we've verified your true identities—"

Zalu turned to me. "Heather, this is goodbye for now, I'm afraid. We won't be totally unreachable, we'll sneak back in later if we can, but this hiding place is burned. My sister and I need to leave—"

"No!" Twil spluttered. "No, you can't leave, I-I love you, I love you both!"

Zalu sighed, then turned and smiled at Twil. "We'll still be right here, Twillamina. The part of us that you love will never leave you. You'll see." Zalu glanced at me again, along with Evelyn and Raine. "We're off, but we'll do what we can first. As soon as we start this, the dream-substrate will become very unstable indeed. Much worse than what's already happening. So be ready. You may need to ... back up a bit. Perhaps out of the pavilion, yes. That would be best."

Xiyu circled around to stand on Twil's opposite side. "We'll hold her off. Weaken her. Screw up her logic. Maybe."

Zalu smiled, nodded, and faced forward, narrowing her eyes at Horror. "And we will be leaving Twillamina in your capable hands, you three. This is a lot of trust!"

Evelyn said, "We'll protect her too. I promise."

"Wait!" I said. "What happens to the ... 'diving suits'?"

Zalu blinked, then plucked at the fabric of her uniform shirt. She broke into a grin, yanked at her grey tie, and pulled it down until it hung at a rakish angle. "These? They're not going anywhere. We can no more part them from Twil than one of you could survive being bisected.”

Raine snorted, “Sounds like you’re speaking from experience.”

Xiyu shot Raine a nasty smile. “Don’t foul your underwear when you see my real face, human. You aren’t going to enjoy this.”

Raine grinned back. “Wager accepted.”

On the far side of the pavilion, Horror took a single step forward. The tip of her umbrella clacked against the concrete foundation. She sighed. “This role-playing must seem very entertaining to you girls, but I’m running out of time and my patience for indulging you is wearing a little thin, especially after the last couple of days. Now, come along and—”

“Sister, here we go,” Zalu said.

She let go of Twil’s hand, much to Twil’s brief confusion; Zalu then opened her palm and presented it to Twil again, with a soft, warm, welcoming smile upon her face. Twil slipped her hand back into position, her other arm clutching the leatherbound tome to her chest. Zalu leaned in and planted a feather-soft kiss on Twil’s lips.

Before Twil could blush or stutter, Xiyu did the same. She held out her hand for Twil to take.

Twil hesitated. “I’ve only got one—”

“Take my hand,” Xiyu said.

Twil obeyed, so she held one Lily in each hand. Xiyu leaned in and kissed her in turn, a fleeting brush of lips against lips.

And by some sleight of hand or trick of the light, Twil’s leatherbound book was gone; it did not fall from her chest or land upon ground, but simply was no more.

Zalu and Xiyu looked forward, flanking Twil, facing Horror, their expressions blank. Twil’s gaze bounced back and forth between her Lillies. Horror took another step forward, sighing a big, unimpressed, long-suffering sigh — and then jerked to a halt, eyes going wide, face blanching with shock.

Twil screamed and stumbled backward, shaking her hands free from the tendrils which she had been holding.

Even I had not noticed the moment of the switch, the split-second blink during which the Lillies — the pair of young women in grey school uniforms, one blonde and one redhead, both as angelically pretty as Twil herself — had been replaced with a pair of Outsider aliens.

I darted over to Twil before she could fall onto her backside. I caught her from behind, arms around her waist, and felt her knees go weak with uncomprehending fear. She kicked at the ground, trying to back away, scrabbling to catch me for support.

“Wh-wh-wha—” she panted.

“Aahhh!” I hissed as pain shot through my wounded leg, throbbing with the sudden twist of extra weight. “Twil— Twil, it’s okay, they’re on our side. I ... I think.”

Zalu and Xiyu — plant-girls, radiates, vegetables, star-spawn — whatever they were, they were two of the most bizarre and beautiful Outsiders I had ever seen.

Their bodies were shaped like upright barrels, about six feet in height, slightly tapered toward the top and bottom; the surface of their ‘skin’ was a marbled brilliance of lush and luxuriant greens — emerald and olive, jade and lime, fir-tree needle and fresh cut grass, shot through with darker bands of subtle yellow, deep orange, and ruby-red. The skin looked tough and thick, like the rind on a citrus fruit crossed with the hide of a cactus. The barrel-shaped body was pentagonal, split into five equal vertical segments like the engorged flesh of a desert succulent; a deep furrow lay at the join of each two segments, frilled with delicate membranes of highly vascular plant-flesh, running all the way down the length of the body, like a vertical slit-orifice sealed by pressure. A tentacle-like arm sprouted from the middle of each segment — it was these which had grasped Twil’s human hands so gently. Each arm-tentacle split into five, then into five again, forming a fractal pattern like the floating fronds of an underwater plant. Each arm thus ended in twenty five tentacle-like fingers, each finger tapering to a dexterous, thick-skinned pad of greenish flesh; Zalu and Xiyu possessed one hundred and twenty five fingers each.

The bottom of the barrel-body terminated in a foot structure shaped like a gigantic starfish, about four feet across, coloured with that same marbled beauty, but with more oranges and reds than deep greens. Each ‘limb’ of the starfish-foot was heavy with muscle, thicker than a human thigh, and covered with rough bristles like a fuzzy tropical fruit.

At the barrel's apex stood a matching starfish-shaped structure — a head, much more complex than the foot. The 'head' of each sister was attached to the barrel-body by a complex system of leathery plates, thick frills and hanging flaps, forming a squat ring of neck. The starfish-head was fuzzed and furred in a similar manner to the foot, but with much finer and more delicate bristles. Each of the five starfish limbs terminated in a stalk about two inches thick, each of which supported a fist-sized greenish globe; each globe blinked open to reveal a huge red eyeball without iris or pupil, giving each of the sisters a quintet of massive blood-red eyes. Similar stalks lay at the join between each starfish limb, terminating in fleshy sacs a little larger than the eyeball-globes. These sacs hinged open to show tiny rows of razor-sharp spikes, like teeth.

Trees crossed with starfish, cast in perfect radial symmetry, born in the unthinkable oceanic depths of Outside.

All five eyeballs on both sisters twisted to point at Horror.

"You're fucking joking!" Evelyn spat.

Raine burst out laughing. "Bitten off more than I can chew, eh?"

Twil was gibbering in my arms. I did my best to drag her back, away from the alien weirdness that had shattered her comfortable dream. Raine darted over to help me, and not a moment too soon.

Horror recovered from her shock, drew herself up, and stared back at the 'Lillies'. "You two stay right where you are. I'm warning you, don't—"

The Lillies tipped forward.

The muscular starfish at the bottom of their bodies bunched and flexed, pushing them over, tipping both of them onto their sides, falling lengthwise.

For a moment I assumed they were falling over, like trees being felled; the nature of their motion made no sense to my ape brain and inapplicable mammalian standards. I doubted I would have understood right away even if I'd had all seven of me in one place and all six tentacles attached to my sides. The way the Lillies' bodies worked was simply too alien for me to comprehend without example.

Both sisters caught themselves with their equatorial tentacular appendages, standing on three sets of tentacles and three of their lower-starfish limbs. They no longer looked like elongated sea anemone, but like something much more animal.

Then they shot outward — Zalu to the right, Xiyu to the left, though I could no longer tell them apart from each other — across the concrete foundation and out into the rain, flanking Horror from both sides.

I gasped. Evelyn's jaw dropped. Raine let out a low whistle. Twil just went silent.

In stillness, the sisters had been strangely beautiful, in the way a deep-sea plant might stir the imagination toward the otherworldly; in motion they were sublime.

I had expected them to drag themselves across the ground with that starfish-shaped foot, crawling and inching like a plant which had grown legs and learned to walk, or like a real starfish, pulling itself across the rocks at the bottom of the sea. But in truth, our unexpected Outsider allies moved with all the swiftness and clarity of predatory squid.

With their bodies now horizontal, the squat 'neck' extended outward like an accordion, twisting and turning like the length of a snake, pointing the starfish-shaped head and the five glowing red eyes toward Horror. They supported themselves on their middle tentacles and the massive muscular starfish limbs at the bottom of their bodies. They spiralled as they advanced, moving with a corkscrew motion, rotating the barrel-shaped body about a central axis; as they moved forward, one tentacle would rise on their left and the corresponding tentacle touched the ground on their right, always perfectly balanced.

When they emerged from beneath the pavilion roof, both sisters spread their wings — great sails of folding membrane shot out from inside the deep furrows between each of their five body-sections, snapping and cracking in the winds of the unnatural storm. The surface of each wing flowed with strange colours in washing sheets of prismatic change. The wings functioned similarly to the tentacles as the Lillies moved, each wing folding back into the furrow to accommodate or assist the spiralling motion as the body turned, a new wing emerging as space opened up on the opposite side of the body. When each wing reached full extension, held tall in the dorsal position, it began to vibrate and quiver, pushing back the raindrops with some extra-dimensional harmony beyond human hearing.

Horror was not impressed.

“Girls,” she said with a little tut. “This display is really very shameful, very unnecessary, quite embarrassing. Are you trying to intimidate me? I don’t think this is the proper way to deal with—”

Ti-ti-ti-ti-ti-tiiiiiiiiiii.

The Lily on the right — Zalu — emitted a clicking, ticking, buzzing sound not unlike a cicada, but a thousand times deeper and more expressive, filled with tone and vocal quality. She had not produced this sound by opening her set of five tooth-lined mouths, but by vibrating a structure I had not been able to see before. In the middle of the starfish-shaped head lay a series of wide slits, fringed with membranes in deeply brilliant oranges and reds. Another kind of mouth, leading deep into the barrel-shaped body.

Whatever Zalu had just said, Horror responded with a sharp sigh. “We don’t use that kind of language at Cygnet. I’ll thank you to—”

Tiiiiiiiiii-ti-ti-tititititi—

Tiiii-iiii-ti-ti—

Tiii-ti!

Xiyu joined in. The Lillies filled the air with a terrible shrieking like a cloud of locusts, the sound rising and falling, flowing in waves like a song heard from an alien shore. Whatever they were saying to Horror, it made her frown, then scowl, then splutter in indignant offense.

“Well!” she shouted over the din. “Well, I never! In all my years of nursing, I’ve never heard such foul, poor-tempered, insulting—”

Both Lillies paused, suddenly still and silent, each with three wings spread to maximum extension, as if building hydrostatic or pneumatic pressure inside their bodies.

And then they launched themselves through the air with a thoomp of release, trailing a contrail of thick gasses behind. They descended toward Horror as a pair of twinned spirals of viridian, wings pumping, tentacles whirling, screaming their cicada cries.

“Raine!” I shouted, dragging Twil backward and shoving her out of the pavilion, into the storm. “Grab—”

But Raine was two steps ahead of me. She grabbed the handles of Evee’s wheelchair and pulled her backward, yanking Evelyn clear of the pavilion. I followed, stumbling out into the pouring rain just in time.

The Lillies crashed into the pavilion, smashing through the plastic roof and the support pillars, tossing the benches aside, landing like a pair of guided missiles. Plastic and wood flew everywhere, followed by tiny chips of concrete. Raine protected Evee with her own body. I flapped out the sides of my yellow blanket to cover Twil, my head instantly drenched with the pouring rain.

Our hurried escape turned out to be unnecessary. Not a single fragment of concrete or speck of flying wood touched any of us, as if swallowed up by the logic of the dream. We all turned to look, confused by the moment of sudden silence.

Horror stood amid the collapsed ruins of the pavilion, none the worse for wear, twirling her umbrella in one hand; the umbrella was open once again, surface running with rainwater.

The Lillies heaved themselves out of the debris as if it was nothing more difficult than a children’s sandbox. But then they backed away from Horror, reversing the direction of their rapid spiral movements.

“How did she survive that!?” I screamed.

Horror huffed. “Survive what, Miss Morell? These games are really not my style, but I can more than hold my own if required. All part of the job, after all!”

The Lillies pounced at her again, twisting and spinning through the air. She flickered her umbrella left and right; the after-image of the cracking canvas trailed with a dark aura, as if cutting a window in the air. Through that window was a vista of black basalt, ashen soil, and towering monoliths of dark green stone. The window vanished as soon as it had appeared; it had not looked like Wonderland — the real Wonderland, outside the dream — but like somewhere else entirely, somewhere unknown to me.

The Lillies bounced off the umbrella like squid slamming into the underside of a boat, wings whirling as they spiralled away like falling sycamore seeds. Rainwater sluiced off their barrel-shaped bodies and ran down their starfish heads and muscular feet.

Tiiii-ti-ti-ti-ti!

Tiii-tiii-tiii!

They shouted at Horror again. She smiled with a little bit too much pleasure, as if enjoying her invulnerability.

“Now now, girls,” she said. “It’s your unreasonable behaviour which has led you to this, nothing I’ve done.”

Evelyn shouted over the rain and the wind: “We have to wake Twil up! Heather! Heather, concentrate on Twil!”

“What!?” I rounded on her, wide eyed with disbelief. “Evee, I’m pretty sure those two count as horror movie monsters, and they still can’t touch Horror! We need to run away! The Fadestone—”

“Heather,” Evelyn snapped. “Look at what’s happening. Their presence is warping the dream. They’re Outsiders — Outsiders to here. They don’t fit the dream, the narrative of this place, just like the King in Yellow had to leave. Twil will fit the narrative. We need her awake, now!”

Twil gaped at us, at the Lillies, at everything, wide-eyed and panting with terror. She clung to me with empty hands, her book long gone, her grey uniform drenched with cold rain, huge amber eyes blinking from behind her ridiculous glasses, streaked with rainwater.

“Wh-what am I supposed to do?!” she wailed. “I’m just me!”

Behind Horror, the trees themselves were warping — growing taller and darker, hardening into jade monoliths of gargantuan stone. The wind filled with an alien, ashen stench, like rotten pumpkin crossed with fish guts. The Lillies howled their clicking insults and launched themselves at Horror a third time, but she batted them away with her umbrella as if they were nothing more substantial than paper lanterns.

A slash in reality widened under the swoop of her umbrella, this time showing the hint of buildings, of a cyclopean stone city in the dripping jungle deeps, the plants black and red and reaching toward the Lillies with thorn-studded vines and carnivorous mouths.

“She’s bringing their own context into the dream!” Evelyn shouted. “They can’t fight that, not for us! Heather, Heather give Twil here, now!”

“Wha—”

“Just put her in front of me!”

To our rear, the Lillies were in retreat, as if pulling back from the invisible reach of things only they could see. Horror advanced toward one, then the other, driving them away. Zalu and Xiyu cringed from her, spiralling in reverse away from the nurse, shouting their clicking, buzzing, insect-like language at her, then at each other. I could not read their alien expressions — their huge red eyeballs were absolutely beyond human emotion — but I could see the panic in the direction of their movements, in the way they backed up, scrambling away from Horror and her reality-slicing umbrella.

They were holding her off, buying time for us, so we could uncork Twil.

“Twil, come— come here!” I pulled Twil as hard as I could, treating her much more roughly than I would ever dare in reality. She squealed and flailed, squeaking and pushing against me. But desperation made me strong. I hauled her in front of Evelyn.

Evee stared upward into Twil’s amber eyes, blinking in the rain.

Twil just stared back down at her, panting with rising terror, trying not to look back at the losing battle unfolding behind us.

“Evee,” I said, water running off my face. “Evee— hic— I hope you have a plan here!”

Raine swung her machete free and turned to face the fight. “I gotta help, sweet thing. I gotta help those two.”

“No!” I snapped. “Stay! Raine, stay! Evee, what are you going to—”

“We already broke her free from the dream,” Evelyn said softly.

“You did that for her, Heather, with that little speech. And now she’s all together again, three in one, with her werewolf returned to her body.”

Twil just gaped. “W-werewolf?! I’m not a werewolf! I’m— I’m nothing, I'm just—”

“You are not nothing!” Evelyn shouted — she had to raise her voice over the panicked ti-ti-ti-tiiiii! screeching from behind us. “That’s what you think, isn’t it? Deep down, past all this dream bullshit, that’s what got you hooked, that one moment of self-doubt.”

Twil’s eyes went wide. “What ... ”

“You’re always so bloody confident,” Evelyn shouted up at her. “And it’s not a mask with you, it’s never a mask. But part of you always doubts, doesn’t it? Part of you doubts if you’ll ever belong to anything. Because of your bloody family and their giant snail god, and you’re not part of that. You can’t play sports at school, because you’d beat the other girls a hundred times over, so you can’t be part of that either. You’ve never had a real group of friends, because you’re in the know, you’re different, you’re separate. You’re proud of what you are, and you should be! But you think it makes you alone, you think it singles you out. And you never fucking say it!”

Twil looked like she was crying, but I couldn’t tell with all the rain.

“No,” she murmured. “I was never—”

Evelyn reached up and grabbed Twil’s absurd grey tie, dragging her downward until they were face to face. “Yes, you do think that! Even with us, with me and Raine and Heather and all the others, you think you’re alone. And you know what!? It was my fault! It was my fault, because I drove you away!”

Evelyn was shouting now, red-faced with fury, not shame or apology. Twil just boggled at her.

“But you’re not alone,” Evelyn finished. “You’re mine, you stupid bitch.”

Evelyn yanked on Twil’s tie, pulling her forward, and forced her lips against Twil’s mouth.

The kiss was clumsy and cold, marred by rainwater and terror and teeth. Twil squeaked and pulled away, red in the face, confused beyond words.

But Evelyn held onto the tie with one hand, raised her other in a fist, and bopped Twil in the face.

Twil went reeling back — more in shock than pain. Evelyn was so reduced inside the dream that her punch did not exactly carry much weight, backed by thin and wasted muscles, delivered by half a hand. But a punch in the face is a punch in the face. Twil rocked back, glasses falling off her nose, blinking in shock and surprise.

And then she paused. Amber eyes narrowed. Her lips peeled back.

“There you are,” Evelyn grunted. “Come get me.”

Twil clenched her jaw, baring all her teeth. Her eyes blazed with anger, bulging from their sockets. She heaved for breath, inflating with fury. Veins stood out on her forehead, tendons bunching and bulging in her neck. She reared up before Evelyn, looking like she wanted to crash down upon her with tooth and claw.

“Rrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrr—”

She let out a belly-deep animalistic growl, one no human throat could have made.

“Twil!” I snapped.

Twil rounded on me, the good-girl exterior cracking as something else pushed through from underneath, something raw and real and ready to fight. My throat closed up, my feet skidding backward in the wood chips, instinct crawling into my throat and telling me to turn and run from this wild animal.

But then Twil saw the real fight over my shoulder. She saw the Lillies falling back, driven into retreat by Horror and her umbrella.

“Twil—”

Raine grabbed my arm and yanked me out of the way, out of Twil’s path. “Let her loose!”

Twil — glasses gone, grey uniform soaked through, hair plastered to her scalp with rainwater — bared her teeth, threw back her head, and howled.

“Awooooooooooooo-ooooow!”

Horror froze.

The Lillies halted their retreat, then turned both quintets of huge red eyes back toward us. I still could not read their expressions, but I understood the meaning all the same — they’d done what they could, the rest was up to us. They both spiralled sideways, as if passing through the tree trunks and melting into the woods. In less than a blink the Outsider twins, the fellow survivors of the Eye and fellow users of hyperdimensional mathematics, had vanished.

The warping effect of their presence vanished with them. Suddenly we were all standing in a dense forest clearing once again, surrounded by nothing more than thick and thorny woods, plunged into the darkness of a rainstorm, battered by torrential downpour.

Horror's umbrella was nothing more than canvas and metal.

"Oh," said Horror, expressionless with shock. "You weren't supposed to come out."

Twil pounced.

She transformed as she leapt, silvery wisps of spirit-matter whirling about her limbs, coalescing into bristling grey-brown fur, forming a pointed snout before her face, wrapping her in solid pneumatic flesh.

A ball of tooth and claw landed upon Horror. She tried to raise her umbrella to ward off the blow, but Twil smashed it aside with a swipe of her claws, ripping it from Horror's grasp and hurling it aside.

Horror said: "Oh come now—"

Twil grabbed Horror's skull in one massive set of claws, wrapped her other around Horror's neck, and pulled Horror's head clean off her shoulders.

bedlam boundary – 24.20

Horror's head parted from Horror's neck with a ripping, tearing, wrenching sound — louder than the storm and the wind and the rain, drowning out the creaking of the trees and the roar of the leaves and the drum of raindrops upon the collapsed ruins of the pavilion. Twil's monstrous paw whirled outward, claws buried deep in Horror's blonde hair, gripping her scalp with sharpened points, painting the air with an arc of her blood.

Horror's final expression was wide-eyed with mute and mild surprise, lips parted in a little o-shape, cheeks flushed with faint and fiery blush. Her tangle of blonde hair hung upside down, loose tresses coming free from the bun at the rear of her head. Beads of blood trickled from the stump of her neck, running down her chin, breaking across her lips, flowing past her eyes, to finally be washed away by the steady beat of swirling rain.

The tableau held still for a second longer than necessary, as if some observer was etching this moment into memory, lingering upon the scene.

Was I producing that effect? Or was this Sevens' influence, scurrying to catch up with our changes to her script? Or did we feel the attention of the Eye itself, turning toward a rupture in the dream?

Then Twil tossed Horror's head to the right and dropped her decapitated corpse to the left. The body slumped onto the wet blanket of sodden wood chips. The head rolled to a stop amid the shattered red plastic of the pavilion roof.

Twil — our Twil once again, all werewolf and more than wild, her body wrapped in bristling grey-white fur over an under layer of reddish brown, upon a foundation of tight, toned, taut muscle, like steel cables wrapped around her bones, with her fingers and toes tipped by long black claws, her face an elongated snout filled with too many teeth, her eyes twin lamplights of deep glowing amber.

She threw her wolfish head to the stormy sky and howled at the top of her lungs.

“Awooooooooooooo-ooooow!”

The howl shook the trees and shivered the leaves and made the raindrops quail in fear. That howl challenged the underbelly of the Eye itself for a single glorious moment, before Twil trailed off, the echoes of her lupine voice absorbed by the wall of thorn and twig.

Then, at my side, Raine threw back her head and joined in:
“Awoooooooooo!”

Raine’s howl was a mere imitation compared with Twil’s canine clarity, just a human throat playing along with the pack. But the howl set off Twil again. She raised her muzzle to the sky and let out another wolfish howl.

“Awoooooooooooooooooo!”

“Awooo!”

“Awooooooooo!”

“Awoo-ooooow-ooooow!”

Twil and Raine went back and forth half a dozen times, until I was wincing and Evelyn was jamming one of the damp towels over her ears.

Finally they both trailed off. Raine had a gigantic grin on her face, puffing for breath, shaking her head as if she’d just lost a race to one of the most beautiful women she’d ever met.

Twil lowered her head slowly, still facing away from us. She dropped into a squat-crouch, shoulders hunched, all four paws on the ground. The pose was more gorilla or chimpanzee than wolf, with the ape showing through beneath the hound, despite the thick and bushy tail curled at the base of her back. Her ribs heaved and shivered with each pumping breath, her silken coat of greyish-red fur wet with rain. The air steamed in front of her snout.

As if signalled by Horror’s defeat, the storm began to taper off. The wind slowed, dying away, lost between the trees. The raindrops shrank and settled, turning back into drizzly mist as the grey and damp day returned to normal. Raine and I were both soaked to the bone, clothes sodden with water, hair plastered to our heads; Evelyn had escaped the worst of it, protected by towels and her big dressing gown snuggled down in the seat of her wheelchair, but she was still horribly damp.

“Hey there, wolfie,” Raine purred at Twil’s back.

Twil turned and looked over her shoulder, toward the three of us.

Amber eyes narrowed to predatory slits. Ears perked up, tips held high. Wolfish snout closed, teeth tucked neatly behind her lips.

Raine slid forward, in front of me and Evelyn. She didn’t raise her machete, but the blade stood naked in her right fist.

“You’re on our side, right wolfie?” Raine said.

“She is!” I answered quickly, though my belly was clenching up and the tiny hairs on the back of my neck were standing on end. Twil stared at us with the poised and pregnant silence of a wolf on the hunt, her gaze steady and unwavering, sleek muscles held in absolute stillness. “Raine, she is, she’s on our side, please don’t do anything rash. Twil!” I called to her. “Twil it’s us! It’s Heather, and Raine, and Eeve. You’re awake now, aren’t you? Twil? Twil, please say something.”

Twil answered by turning to face us. She rose from her crouch, front paws lifting off the ground, amber eyes flicking from one face to the next, cycling between me, then Raine, then Eeve. She made no sound at all, neither a word nor a growl.

Adrenaline rushed into my head. Instinct told me to run. This was a predator, a carnivore, a memory from the distant animal past, baked into my cells themselves. Twil — the wolf — was not angry or aggressive. She was hunting. She would dismantle us like food if we let her close.

“Oh no,” I said, then hiccuped painfully. “Oh. Oh, um.”

Raine’s machete twitched in her fist; she wet her lips with a flicker of her tongue. “I can take her—”

“Raine, no!” I whined.

“—but she regenerates, right? We don’t have any silver to stop her for real. Steel won’t do the trick, am I right?”

“We won’t need silver or steel!” I yelled, my own shout chasing fear back down into my guts. I stepped forward, hobbling on my wounded left shin again, as if scrawny little Heather could possibly hold back a werewolf. “Twil! Twil, it’s us! It’s— hic, ow! It’s me, it’s Heather! I’m your friend and I love you. Twil? Twil!”

Twil locked her gaze on Raine and took a step forward.

Twil's werewolf form was beautiful; I had rarely gotten any real opportunities to examine the shape of her transformation in full. She really was the stereotypical movie werewolf, a perfect cross between homo sapiens and canis lupus, though lacking the more ostentatious or gruesome features of Hollywood's imagination. Sleekly furred, lightly muscled, arms and legs elongated, a little like the limbs of an ape. Her four paws were each tipped with long blackish claws, like those of a real wolf. Her transformation gifted her perhaps a couple of inches of additional height, but she was still comfortably short, only a tiny bit taller than me, still recognisably Twil-sized. Her face was stretched forward into a long elegant snout, filled with lots of big white teeth, punctuated by her own amber eyes, topped with a pair of twitching, mobile little ears. She moved with a rolling, loping, canine gait, stalking across the ruins of the pavilion, coming right for us.

Raine raised her machete and raised her voice: "Hey, hey! I don't wanna fight you, friend!" Twil ignored her, padding closer. "I don't wanna fight you, I mean it! We're all friends, right? All buddies here? Didn't I date you once? That's what Heather says." Raine took a step back. "Hey, Twil, you touch either Heather or Eevee and I will have to fight you. Stop there, right there. Come on, girl. Don't make me do this, don't make me—"

Twil's lips peeled back from her wolfish teeth. A slow growl rose in her throat, vibrating deep and low in her chest. My heart skipped a beat, and not for the fun reasons. Raine reached for my hand to drag me back and out of the way and—

"Down!"

Evelyn's shout carried more force than her weak and withered body seemed capable of projecting. I flinched too. Raine twitched, almost as if she'd been about to obey the command.

Twil stopped. Her jaw closed. She ceased to growl. Amber eyes flickered to Evelyn.

"Stay," Evelyn snapped. Twil obeyed, easing back onto her haunches. "Good," Evelyn added. "Now wake up."

Twil just stared, a hound failing to comprehend an unfamiliar order.

"I said wake up!" Evelyn shouted. "Wake the fuck up, Twil! Come on!" Evelyn slapped the armrest of her wheelchair, temper fraying. "We all need you. I need you! Wake up!"

Twil blinked three times, straightened up out of her loping crouch, and shook herself like a wet dog. Raindrops flew everywhere. I squinted my eyes shut, wolf-fur spray misting against my face.

The werewolf transformation began to collapse. Wisps of pneumatic spirit-matter parted and drifted aside like fog beneath the morning sun, tendrils and veils turning pale before vanishing into nothing, unwinding the thickly glossy fur, peeling away the slabs of muscle, revealing Twil's limbs beneath. Her torso emerged next, still wrapped in that grey school uniform, blazer and skirt both sopping wet with rainwater. Her snout shrank as if sucked back into her face, her true features emerging from the surface. Twil's real eyes were just as brightly amber, set in a pale face wracked by a squinting frown.

Twil looked as confused as a dog confronted by the lifting of a dream.

"Finally," said Evelyn. "There you are."

Raine lowered her machete and puffed out a sigh of relief. "Thanks for the save, Evee. I wasn't looking forward to that fight."

"Twil!" I said, hurrying over to her. "Twil, are you okay?! Are you awake? Do you recognise us? Twil?"

Twil raised both hands to ward me off — but she was no longer the shrinking violet, the nervous and apologetic parody of her prior dream-self. She neither recoiled from me nor retreated in fear, just stuck her hands out in total confidence that I would halt, no questions asked.

Though she wore the same clothes and sported the same hairstyle, Twil looked completely different to five minutes earlier. Her eyes were wide and alert, sharp and active, rather than withdrawn and veiled. Her face was no longer composed into a permanent expression of forced feminine passivity, but moved with all the angelic energy she usually displayed. Even the way she held herself was different — hips forward, shoulders back, head high.

She slowly looked left and right, amber eyes roving the clearing with a bewildered frown. Then she looked at me and flinched, blinking with sudden recognition, eyes darting to Raine and Evelyn in turn.

“Twil?” I repeated.

“Uhhhhhhhhhhhhhh,” said Twil, emitting a sound like a printer suffering a nasty mechanical error. “What ... like ... where ... uhhh?”

Twil’s voice had lost the airy, floaty, high-pitched tone, no longer a conduit for the dialogue of a heroine from a bad lesbian novel. She had dropped back to her usual cocktail of gravel and honey, soft and rough both at the same time.

“Welcome back to reality,” Evelyn grunted. “Is what I’d like to say, but this isn’t it. So welcome back to your senses, I suppose.”

I stepped closer, one hand out in case Twil needed support. “Twil, do you know where you are, or what’s been happening?”

Twil blinked up and around at the wall of trees again, at the bulwark of twig and thorn in every direction. The forest seemed to be slowly thinning again now, the paths re-opening, the unnatural arena falling away after Horror’s defeat.

“Twil?”

She finally looked at me and blew out a long sigh, puffing out her cheeks. “Yeah.”

“ ... yeah?” I echoed.

Twil shrugged, a goofy smile spreading across her face. “Well, nah, not really. But wherever I am, I’m with you three, right?”

“Oh, Twil!”

Twil waved a hand at me, perhaps to forestall a hug. She squinted her eyes shut and frowned, much harder than before. “Uh, for serious, gimme a sec here, Big H. I’m kinda catching up. It’s like I’ve been dreaming for days. This is weird shit.”

I heaved a big sigh of relief. “Oh, it really is you. You’re awake, you’re with us! Twil, I missed you!”

“Uh, yeah,” Twil said, still with her eyes scrunched up. “Missed you three too. What—”

“Do you know where you are?” I asked. “Or what’s happening?”

Twil squeezed her eyes shut even harder — then they flew open, joined by a positively incandescent blush rushing up the sides of her neck and exploding into her cheeks. She stared at me, amber eyes gone wide, then glanced at Evee, then back at me.

“Twil?”

“Uh ... y-yeah. Yeah ... I. Oh, oh wow.” She swallowed hard. “I’ve been like, in a trance, or something? Oh wow, this is really no-shit hella embarrassing. What have I been doing this whole time?”

Evelyn snorted. “Having fun, apparently.”

Twil rounded on her, bright red in the face. “That wasn’t me! None of that was really me!”

“Yes,” Evelyn said. “Yes it was. And it’s fine to admit it. I shouldn’t laugh.”

Twil boggled at her, then shook her head, turning away. “Damn. Uh, yeah, damn, that was some major high-key embarrassing shit. Uh, you guys, uh, if you could maybe, like, forget about ... about ...”

She trailed off, voice going small and reedy, then looked up and looked at me, wide-eyed with shock.

Twil burst into tears.

She was not a pretty little crier, our werewolf. Twil’s tears were big and messy. She let out a sudden series of wracking sobs and threw herself at me, arms going around my back, burying her face in my shoulder. It was one of the most uncomfortable hugs I’d ever experienced, mostly because she and I were both soaked through by the rain. I squeaked, left leg almost buckling beneath me; Twil seemed to instinctively understand what was wrong — she pulled back and used the pressure of the hug to hold me up.

“I’m one of you guys, right?!” she asked me through her tears. “I’m — I’m one of you, yeah? I always was, right?!”

“Yes, yes!” I answered, hugging her back as hard as I dared. “You are, Twil! Of course you are!”

“Shit, shit, shit!” Twil sobbed.

Twil's crying jag ended almost as quickly as it had begun. She sobbed and sniffed a few more times, then awkwardly let go of me and stepped back, wiping her eyes and scrubbing at her face. She took a series of deep breaths, not forcing it down but letting it all out. One with final sniff she seemed to steady herself — but then she looked at Evee, her face dropping into desolate emotion all over again.

Evelyn said: "Hug me like Heather and you'll break my fucking spine."

"Y-yeah," Twil said, swallowing hard, nodding along. "I-I'm cool now. I'm cool. I think."

"Twil," I said gently. "How much do you remember—"

"All of it," she said through a big cringe.

"Okay, so, do you know where you are? Both physically and metaphysically??"

Twil blew out a big breath. "Yeah. Well, kinda, like. We're all trapped in a cartoon mental hospital or some shit? Evil nurses and crap like that. Sevens is in charge of the place. The Eye is a fucking gilf or something. Lozzie threw a riot. Which, you know, good. Fuck this place." She sighed and shook her head, almost laughing. "Would be funny if it wasn't so dumb. Or, like, serious, I know. And me, yeah, I was ... "

Twil looked down at herself. Her mouth dropped open.

"What the fuck am I wearing!?" she said. She plucked at the absurd school uniform, lifting the sides of the grey blazer, her face contorting with disgust and dismay as she pulled at the tie around her neck. "Why am I dressed like a prep school wanker?! Or an anime girl? And it's all grey, what the hell?! Did you put me up to this?" She pointed at Evee. "Is this like your fantasy, projected onto me?"

"Ha!" Evelyn barked, utterly unembarrassed. That made Twil blink in surprise. "If I was in charge of dressing you up, you'd be wearing a magical girl outfit. In pink. With frills. High heels maybe. No, Twil, none of us had a hand in any of this. You did this to yourself."

"That's not precisely accurate," I said gently. "Technically the Eye is responsible for all of this. Kind of. You were just—"

“Yeah, yeah, I remember the chat earlier, Big H, it’s cool.” Twil huffed. “But seriously, this?” she gestured up and down at herself. “I look like a private school mascot!”

Evelyn snorted again. “And you were having yourself quite the nice little fantasy.”

Twil grimaced, hissing through her teeth. She grabbed the lapels of her grey blazer and peeled the sodden garment off her shoulders, then threw it at the ground with a wet slap. Her white shirt was soaked through as well, stuck to her skin, leaving very little to the imagination, highlighting the outline of a bra against her torso.

I blushed, putting one hand to my mouth. “Um, Twil. I-I can see your—”

She grabbed her grey tie and yanked the knot forward, pulling and tugging until the whole thing came loose. She was about to cast that away as well, but then thought better of it and stuck the loose tie into her skirt pocket. Then she reached up and tore the top two buttons off her shirt, opening the collar and releasing her throat, revealing a slip of collarbone on either side.

Twil hesitated, then shouted, “Fuck it!” and ripped the rest of her shirt open, pulling the buttons free all the way to the bottom.

Thankfully she didn’t peel the shirt off as well, but left it draped over her shoulders, open down the middle. Even so, the open shirt left nothing to the imagination.

“T-Twil—” I stammered.

“I don’t fuckin’ care!” Twil spat. “Fuck this, fuck all of it! I’d go naked if I thought I could get away with it. Screw this skirt, too. I didn’t even wear shit this bad in secondary school! And why is my hair so straight?!” She reached up and ran both hands through her unnaturally straightened hair, messing it up in every possible direction, until her head was a mass of jumbled dark tresses. “Fuckin’ take away my curls, bitch-ass stupid dream shit.” She huffed. “Uh, sorry, Big H. Eevee. Raine. Just ... this is real weird. I hate this.”

“We’ve all been through it,” I said as gently as I could. “Some of us worse, some of us easier. Just ... do what you need to do, Twil.”

Twil sniffed and ran a hand through her hair. She had gone from prudish good-girl to punk-rock rakish in record time. The open-shirt look suited her, even if it was dictated by nothing more than necessity.

“Yeah, yeah. I think I’m alright now,” she muttered. “Mostly. Kinda. Fuuuuuck that was weird.”

“Twil, I need to ask you, very seriously. How much do you remember? How much are you aware of?”

Twil let out a big sigh. “All of it, like I said before. Look, I’m good, I’m cool, I’m up to speed. We’re inside a dream, trapped in a mental hospital, all that weird jazz. And you’ve lost your tentacles.” Twil gestured at me. “Sorry to hear about that. Fuckin’ sucks for you, right?”

“Um, yes,” I replied. “It does ‘fucking suck’, to put it lightly. Thank you.”

Twil nodded at Raine. “Raine’s half-awake, right?” Then Eeve. “Evelyn, Eeve, you ... you doing alright like that?”

“No,” Eeve grunted. “I am confined to this chair. My magic does not work. Praem is reduced to a plushie.”

“Figures,” Twil said with a grimace. “Sorry. You’re in real bad, worst of us all. Wish I could, like, do something to help.”

“Huh,” Eeve grunted again. “Thank you.”

“So, yeah,” Twil said. “I’m up to speed. I even remember ... the ... hey?” Twil squinted and trailed off, looking left and right, one hand out as if reaching for somebody who should have been at her side. “Where are the two girls I was with?” Twil cracked a sudden grin. “Daaaaaaamn. Damn, that was my fantasy? Hooooo, okay, I mean I’m not into the schoolgirl look, it’s kinda shitty, but those two were fine as fuck. Nice!”

Evelyn rolled her eyes. “They were you, you absolute moron. You were playing out your own sapphic boarding school fantasy with yourself and yourself. You may as well have been snogging the back of your own hand.”

Twil laughed, relieved at last. “Yeah, which means I’m fine as fuck too! I think you agree, right?”

Evelyn answered by rolling her eyes again. “This is going to be insufferable.”

“Maybe I should dye my hair blonde for a bit, like the first one,” Twil muttered, then cleared her throat. “Uh, but yeah, I mean, they were real ten out of ten hot shit, right up until the part where they turned into plants, which was weird.”

“I thought the plants were really pretty,” I said. “In a very ... special ... way?”

Everyone was looking at me, so I trailed off and stopped talking.

“Aliens,” Twil said. “Actual no-shit aliens. Plant people! Hiding inside my mind. Weird. Thank fuck they were on our side, right?”

“Yes, quite,” I said.

“Twil,” Evelyn said, rather matter-of-fact. “You’ve got your werewolf transformation back, yes? We may be relying on you. We can’t have any duds.”

Twil snorted, rolled her eyes, and trudged over to Evee’s wheelchair. The back of her white shirt was still wet, stuck to her skin. Her tattoos were clearly visible through the sodden fabric — beautiful dark green spirals of solid colour, stretching from her shoulders all the way down her back, vanishing beneath the waistline of her skirt. The spiral pattern had no beginning and no end, forming one unbroken line; yet when one looked at any single point, a hundred dead ends appeared to proliferate in one’s peripheral vision, animating the spirals with sinuous, coiling, snake-like motions.

Twil stopped a few paces from Evee, put her hands on her hips, and said: “Of course I’m back to normal. I’m completely in contro—”

A pair of wolf ears sprung from the top of Twil’s head with a little ‘spoink!’ sound effect — an actual noise, not just something in my imagination. Furred in luxuriant greyish-red, they twitched and shivered as Twil stood there blinking in surprise. A half-second later, a bushy tail sprouted from her rear, lifting the back of her grey skirt, swishing back and forth as if with sudden excitement.

Raine burst out laughing. Evelyn cleared her throat and raised her chin. Twil touched her ears and tail, frowning in confusion.

“You were saying?” Evelyn asked.

"I didn't do this on purpose!" Twil went all shrill. "It's just ... it's never been this easy before. Is this because we're in a dream?"

"Probably," Evelyn grunted. "Or maybe you've come to terms with something and turned into a furry."

"Well, shit. I'm riding high, I guess." Twil cracked a grin, tail wagging — then stopped, and stopped grinning too, frowning down at Evee. "Hey, you bopped me in the face earlier. Like, you actually punched me, Evee."

"Just doing what I had to."

Twil rubbed her chin, though she wasn't even bruised. Her cheeks went a little red. Her tail stuck straight out. "You, uh ... all that stuff you said. When you were waking me up. What about all that?"

"I meant every word," Evelyn said, utterly unembarrassed. "And the kiss, too. A little bit more important than the punch, no?"

Twil didn't seem to know what to say for a moment. She cleared her throat, turned away and back again, then just nodded. Her tail coiled up, her wolf-ears went flat. "Well, uh. We can like, talk about all that when we're out of here. Yeah?"

"Certainly," Evelyn deadpanned. "My beloved mongrel."

Twil spluttered. "Don't fuckin' call me that, that's weird! And I'm not a mongrel."

Evelyn smiled, as much with her eyes as with her mouth. Twil frowned at her for a long moment, blushing awkwardly. After a moment, her new tail started wagging again. Eventually she turned away, looking at me and Raine.

"Big H, hey," she said. "Thanks for the assist. Meant a lot. I already like, hugged you and all. You know?"

"You're welcome. I like your, um, new tail, yes. Um. Really, the Lillies did most of the heavy lifting. I really, really hope they come back. We could use their help a second time."

I stuck my hand inside my yellow blanket and felt for the greenish soapstone coins, just to make sure they were secure. They were still slightly warm from the Lillies' hands.

"Huh," Evelyn grunted. "We could, yes. Though I would rather not rely on the whims of those particular Outsiders."

I boggled at her. “Why not? They more than proved themselves.”

Evelyn chewed on her tongue for a moment. “I’ll refer you to the relevant passages of certain books sometime. I recognised them, by description. That’s all.”

“The Lillies specifically? Zalu and Xiyu?”

Evelyn shook her head. “No. Their ‘species’, I suppose.”

I let out a little sigh. “Evee, imagine if you recognised a human being by description. On average we’re a pretty nasty species too. You don’t even have to go beyond England to find some of the worst examples of us. Don’t judge the Lillies just because they were big starfish cactus creatures. They helped us, without holding back. And they were like me! They were taken by the Eye!”

Evelyn let out a grudging sigh. “Fine, fine.”

While Evelyn and I debated the nature of our Outsider friends, Twil and Raine were eyeing each other up, far too much like a pair of unfamiliar dogs.

“You look like total shit,” Twil said to Raine, grinning with friendly affection, tail wagging back and forth. “Like you’ve been dragged backwards through a cesspit.”

Raine broke into a slow grin too, looking Twil up and down. “Did we really used to date?”

Twil grimaced. “For like five minutes. You aren’t my type, Raine, real talk. You never were. I was just lonely and being funny.”

Raine nodded slowly, then tilted her head from side to side, cracking and popping the vertebrae in her neck. “So, this is the real Twillamina, huh?”

Twil’s grimace did double-duty. “Shiiiiit, don’t call me that. That is not my real name. Cringey bullshit.”

“Sure thing, Twil,” Raine purred. “I think you and I are gonna get on just fine.”

Twil eyed Raine again; Twil’s new tail stopped wagging. “You’re weird like this.”

“Weird how?”

“ ... I dunno,” Twil said. “You get my hackles up. Like you’re gonna throw down all of a sudden. Like I don’t wanna turn my back toward you. Hey, Big H, Heather, is she really safe like this?”

I cleared my throat. “Behave, please. Both of you. Raine, be a good girl for me. And Twil, yes, Raine is on our side. Unquestionably.”

Raine shot Twil a wink. Twil blew out a long, long sigh. “Alright. One for all and all for one and all that shit. So, like, what do we do now?”

Evelyn spoke up. “First, I think we should inspect your kill. Make sure we’ve been successful. Somebody wheel me over there, please.”

In the shock and aftermath of the fight and the victory and Twil’s transformation, nobody offered an alternative course of action, and we did need to go check on the dubious spoils of our little war, after all. I started to hobble over to take the handles of Eeve’s wheelchair, but Twil got there first. She said, “I’ll do it, I feel strong and energetic. You gotta rest that leg, right?”

“That she does,” Evelyn said. “Heather, take your weight off that leg. Twil, you’re on wheelchair duty — and do not leave me behind if I need to move. Understand?”

“Yeah, yeah,” Twil grumbled with a smile in her voice. “I got you, Saye.”

“And I’ve got Heather,” said Raine. She slipped her machete away inside the canvas bag on the back of Eeve’s wheelchair, then helped me to stand properly, with an arm beneath my shoulders. She took a good portion of my body weight so I could lessen the burden on my wounded left shin.

We four — five, if one counted Praem tucked away inside Evelyn’s big grey dressing gown — circled around the ruins of the shattered pavilion, to where Horror’s headless corpse and decapitated cranium lay, at the edge of the plastic and wooden rubble.

Horror’s body lay on its side, twisted by the angle at which Twil had dropped it; both arms were stuck out backward, one pinned awkwardly beneath her body weight, the other flopped at an unnatural angle, hanging limp over her opposite side. One leg was bent backward, the other lay straight. They both looked broken. She seemed no smaller or less imposing in death, wrapped in her puffy white coat and matching uniform.

Horror's head sat upright in a pile of red plastic roof fragments. The eyes were open, staring straight ahead. The mouth gaped slightly, the echo of a final unspoken word on her tongue. A trickle of blood ran from the corner of her lips.

"Looks pretty dead to me," Twil muttered, leaning over Evee's shoulder from behind. "I kinda remember doing it, but ... kinda hazy, like."

Evelyn snorted. "This isn't right. Can't you see?"

Raine said, "Not enough blood."

"Eh?" Twil frowned. "What? What are you two talking about?"

"Not enough blood," Raine repeated. "Should be a lot more blood in a human body than that."

"She's right," I said with slowly dawning realisation. "I've ... well, all of us, really, we've all seen more than our fair share of corpses. There's nowhere near enough blood around the body and the head. Look at that little puddle. That's not enough blood from a fatal neck wound."

A picturesque little pool of blood lay beneath the ragged stump of the neck, still and serene, the edges perfectly rounded as if it was refusing to mix with the moisture on the ground. It could not have been more than a single mug-full worth of crimson. No blood at all had pooled beneath the severed head, not even a few droplets.

"Huh," Twil grunted, frowning hard. "Okaaaaay. That's weird, yeah. Maybe it's the sun? Maybe it dried? Sun's finally coming out, after ... all ... " Twil trailed off as she looked up, one hand out to feel for the rain. "Is that ... the Eye, up there? Like, in the sky?"

"Yes," I confirmed. "And it's a good sign that you can see that, by the way. That means you're fully awake."

Twil puffed out a big sigh. "Great. Still. Sun's coming out. That's gotta be a good sign, hey?"

Twil was correct. The rain had ceased and the light was slowly brightening, creeping through the woodland canopy with gentle fingers of early afternoon sun. The ragged remains of the wind rustled the leaves against themselves, but no longer shook the trees with freezing gusts. The storm had passed, blown itself out, leaving behind a sunny afternoon.

“Not necessarily,” Evelyn grunted. “All it means is the conditions of the dream have changed. The rules or the script or whatever, it’s all adjusted according to our actions.”

“Yeah,” Twil said, “because we beat the mid-boss, right?” She gestured at Horror’s head and corpse again. “One down, one to go. How is this bad?”

“It’s not,” I said gently. “This is very good. Thank you, Twil, you did the right thing by killing her. We exploited the nature of the dream and we won this battle. But the war is far from over. Um, not to get too metaphorical.”

“Yuuuuuup,” Raine echoed me. She made sure I could stand properly, then left my side briefly. She circled around the ruins of the pavilion to the right, then doubled back to the left, head on a swivel as she stared off into the woods. “We need to be on the lookout for the next move.”

Twil snorted. “But—”

“This isn’t Castlevania,” Raine went on. “The hospital won’t come crumbling down just because we cut off Dracula’s head.” Raine thumbed at the corpse. “And she ain’t Dracula, anyway.”

“Yes,” I added. “I have only the vaguest idea what ‘Castlevania’ means, but Raine is right. One nurse is not the entire institution.”

Twil laughed and spread her hands, shaking her head with disbelief. “Uhh, but you’ve got me now, yo? Can’t we just walk in the front door and bust some heads open? I’m invincible!”

“They’ll have silver now,” I said.

“Ha!” Evelyn barked. “Probably. Good thinking, Heather.”

Twil went wide-eyed, staring at me. “Wh-what?”

I sighed and rubbed at my eyes, feeling exhausted. “Sorry. I mean, it’s just a guess, but it makes perfect sense. The dream reacts to the changes we make. I’m not willing to risk you putting yourself up front and getting stabbed with a silver dagger or something, Twil. We’ve introduced the concept of a werewolf into the dream. It may react accordingly. We’ve gotten this far by being careful and cautious, by relying on proper planning. We have no reason to change that now.”

Twil boggled at me, then at Evelyn. Eevee nodded in silent agreement. Finally Twil turned and appealed to Raine for help, but Raine just smirked, and said, “You ain’t solving all our problems alone, wolfie.”

“Then what the fuck was the point!?” Twil went shrill. Her tail went all bushy, bristling with anger, while her wolf-ears stood straight up. “All that stuff about me you said to the Lillies, was that bullshit? Aren’t I your ace in the hole? I thought we were gonna rock up through the front door so I could go all Brinkwood style on their asses!”

I took a deep breath and closed my eyes, gathering my thoughts. “Twil—”

“No, seriously,” Twil interrupted before I could get the words out. “What was the point of freeing me if we’re not gonna strike back?”

Evelyn snapped, “Because we all love you, you dozy mutt.”

Twil spluttered to a halt. “Wha— I mean— buh— um—”

“We would free you even if you were completely bloody useless,” Evelyn went on. “Because, as Heather so eloquently said, you are and always will be one of us. Look at me, I’m borderline useless right now myself. No magic, very little help, practically a burden with this wheelchair. But Heather moved heaven and earth to free me. We’d all do the same for you. Stop whining.”

“Eevee,” I said, gently but firmly. “Do not call yourself useless, please.” Then I opened my eyes and raised my chin. “Twil.”

“Y-yeah?” Twil’s tail curled upward and her ears went flat. “What’s up, Big H?”

“As I was trying to say. Sooner or later, Lizzie will throw a second riot, a second attempt at her revolution. Those girls in the hospital, whatever they really are, they’re ready to boil over whenever she says. And when Lizzie turns up the heat and makes that happen, we need to be ready.”

Twil frowned at me, mildly confused. “Sure we do? Yeah, of course, we do?”

“You, Zheng, Praem, Raine,” I went on. “Eevee, if we can get her magic back. Even me, if I can somehow regain my brain-math or get my other selves back. Yes, Lizzie has freed the Cattys, and the Knights will be on our side eventually. But when Lozzie throws that riot, we have to be ready, as a group, to fight for that. The next time the institution responds, we have to be prepared to do incredible violence to protect those girls and overthrow the systems at play here. If we rush in there now and you get overwhelmed, we will have wasted that future opening. We support Lozzie's revolution, the moment she needs us. We don't go off beforehand. That's my plan."

Twil gaped at me, then swallowed, looking me up and down. She nodded slowly. "Okay. Okay, sure. Holy shit, Big H. When'd you turn into Che Guevara?"

I blinked, bewildered. "I'm sorry? Pardon?"

Raine chuckled with affectionate laughter. "Little Lozz ain't the only revolutionary at work around here."

A blush exploded into my cheeks. "I'm just laying out the obvious strategy! I'm not making a special argument here, really! I don't know the first thing about guerilla warfare, this is just obvious stuff, isn't it?"

"To some," Evelyn grumbled, though she had a strange little smile on her lips.

Twil shrugged. "Not to me, I guess. Sure, though. We'll go with your plan, Big H. You're the one with most of the dream in your head, after all. So, what's the next step now we've done for Horror?"

"I, um ... " I trailed off, feeling a weight settling on my shoulders. My head felt heavy and tired. My left leg was throbbing very badly, the wound gone stiff and hard now the worst of the adrenaline had once again left my bloodstream. My hair was still wet, my pajama bottoms were soaked through, and my slippers were sodden with water; my torso and shoulders had been protected from the worst of the rain by the yellow blanket, but the rest of me had not fared so well. "I'm not sure," I said eventually. "We're all tired and wet after that. We need to regroup, um ... "

"Sunshine'll help with that part," Twil said, spreading her arms to catch more of the slowly brightening sun. "This is pretty good, actually!"

She had a point. The light and heat were climbing toward those of a proper summer's afternoon, despite the absence of a real sun in the sky. My hair was starting to dry out a little. I flapped the sides of my yellow blanket.

"That's ... true."

Raine stepped past me and headed toward Horror's collapsed body. "Executive decision," she said. "Let's turn Horror upside down and shake her by the ankles, see if any goodies fall out of her pockets."

"Raine!" I tutted, vaguely horrified.

Luckily for our sensitive constitutions and the contents of our collective stomachs, Raine was not speaking literally in her proposed handling of Horror's already grisly corpse. She rolled the body onto its back and spent a few minutes going through the pockets of both the coat and the nurse uniform. I watched, feeling a little sick, but unable to look away; we had killed this woman, whatever she really was, whatever she represented. Evelyn and Twil watched as well, though Twil took several moments to re-arrange Evelyn's towels and help with her dressing gown, so the damp patches would dry in the sun. Evelyn grumbled and fussed, but she submitted to Twil's tender care without further complaint.

Raine recovered Horror's cattle-prod stun-gun, though the weapon failed to activate when she thumbed the button; perhaps the electrical components had been ruined by the rainwater. She dug out Horror's mobile phone, nice and dry, with plenty of charge left in the battery. She tossed the phone to Twil, to slip into the canvas bag on the back of Evee's wheelchair. Next came a lanyard and an ID card, with a little photograph of Horror herself printed on the plastic. The card showed an employee number and her name — simply A.HORROR, the same as on her name badge. She had a purse with two credit cards and no cash, but nothing else of note within the pink leather folds. Last but not least, the inner pockets of her uniform provided us with an unexpected bounty — a heavy bunch of keys in all different shapes and sizes, hanging from a big steel keyring.

"Bingo," Raine said, straightening up and cracking a grin, dangling the jingling bunch from her fingers. "Keys to the kingdom."

"I doubt any of those will open the high-security wing," I said. "But that's wonderful, yes! We could potentially get in anywhere we need. We could find somewhere to rest, somewhere more secure than that locker room, at least.”

Raine winked at me. “Or we could find weapons. Food. Clothes. Whatever you like, sweet thing.”

“Or the morgue,” Evelyn grunted. “If they have one.”

I blinked at her. “The ... the morgue? Why? What for?”

Evelyn sighed. “We’ve already discussed this, Heather. I need my mother’s corpse. Or more accurately, her thigh bone. If I’m going to be a mage once again, inside this dream, I need my wand.”

Twil leaned around Evee’s chair and boggled at her. “What?!”

Evelyn rolled her eyes. “The less you comprehend, the better for you.”

“Wait wait wait,” Twil said. “No way. Your wand, that bone, the real one, like. That was your mother’s leg all this time!?”

Evelyn folded her arms. The Praem Plushie seemed to peek over her forearms. “Like I said, Twil. The less you know, the better for you.”

“Fucking hell!” Twil said. “Absolutely not! You need something, I wanna know about it, Evee! I don’t care what it is—”

Evelyn spluttered. “Just— stop— Twil, please—”

I spoke over both of them, trying to cut this short. “We all have to accept how weird this is. If getting Evee’s magic back means stealing her mother’s thigh bone, then, fine. That’s what we’ll do.”

Twil puffed out a big sigh. “Yeah, that’s what I’m saying, yo. Is that our next step, then?”

“Actually,” I said slowly, as a lump formed in my throat. “No. I think our next move has to be dictated by ... available ... resources.”

“Eh?” Twil frowned.

Evelyn said, “Heather, what are you talking about?”

Raine walked back over to the wheelchair and tossed the bunch of keys into our canvas bag. Then she drew her machete and removed it from the fabric sheath. She nodded to me, unsmiling, taking this entirely seriously.

“Arm or leg?” she asked.

I winced. “That probably won’t be enough, not by itself.”

Twil glanced between me and Raine, frown deepening, wolf ears going flat. “What the hell are you two talking about?” she said slowly.

“Freeing Zheng,” I said, unable to meet Twil’s eyes.

“Ah,” Evelyn said. “I should have guessed.”

“What?” Twil said, low and slow.

Raine nodded, hefting her machete in one hand. “Both arms? Both legs? More?”

I swallowed, trying not to feel nauseated. This was all a dream, and none of the people here were inhabiting their real, actual, physical bodies. But it was going to look and feel entirely authentic.

“Probably an arm,” I said. “For bulk. And ... and ... we need the heart. Zheng always has a thing about hearts. She finds them very symbolic.”

Raine pulled a big comedic wince. “That’s gonna get real messy. I can do it, sweet thing, ain’t saying I can’t. But I’m gonna be messy once I’m done.”

“We’ll find you a shower afterward, so you can clean up.”

Twil held out both hands. “Can one of you three explain to me what the hell you’re talking about? ‘Cos I don’t like where this is going.”

I raised my eyes to Twil’s face, then looked over at Horror’s corpse, lying on it’s back.

Twil went pale. “Oh, fuck no.”

“I promised Zheng she could eat a nurse,” I said. “Horror, specifically. I don’t think we can carry the whole corpse without getting spotted, especially trying to get it into the hospital, even with Eevee’s Fadestone to help us. But an arm for bulk, and the heart for symbolic reasons, we can do that. It will probably free Zheng. We do Zheng next, because the resources are right here, and we’re unlikely to get a better chance than this. Then we find Eevee’s mother’s corpse, solve the magic problem. Then we ... figure out Praem? We can go from there.”

“Fuuuuuuck,” Twil groaned. Her wolf ears went flat and her tail tucked up between her legs. “Oh shit, yo, I don’t wanna see this! How do you even get a heart out of a chest?”

Raine grinned. “With a big enough knife, all things are possible.”

“Ohhhh fuck,” Twil moaned.

“I thought you were a werewolf, Twil?” Evelyn grumbled. “Show some ... some ... stomach.”

“That doesn’t mean I wanna watch Raine go all Texas Chainsaw Massacre on some lady’s corpse! Fucking hell!”

Evelyn looked a little green in the face as well. She cleared her throat. “Well, we can both look away, then. I’ll thank you to wheel me around, please.”

“No time like the present,” Raine announced. “I’ll get to straight to work, make this quick. Sweet thing, you don’t have to watch either.”

“I ... I think I owe it, to you, maybe even to Horror,” I said, though sweat broke out on my forehead and down my back. “Just ... let’s get this over with, as quickly and efficiently as we can, yes.”

Raine grabbed three of the spare towels from inside the canvas bag, then strode back over toward the corpse. I crossed my arms over my chest, hugging myself tight, my mouth going dry; I didn’t want to watch the gory details, but I had ordered Raine to do this, so I could not allow her to shoulder the entire burden alone, no matter how robust and sturdy her stomach.

Twil turned Eeve’s wheelchair away, to spare both of them from observing the coming butchery. Evelyn reached out with one hesitant hand and brushed the edge of Twil’s bushy tail. Twil flinched, then relaxed. I left them to their flirting — or whatever it was — and focused on Raine’s work with Horror.

Raine worked fast, without speaking or cracking jokes or any unnecessary flair. She knelt next to the corpse and manoeuvred Horror’s right arm out of her puffy white raincoat, extending it perpendicular from her body. Raine raised the machete, using her other hand to guide her aim. The limb came off in three quick hacks with the blade — chop chop chop, like a butcher’s knife slamming through meat. I felt bile rise up my throat as Raine finally cut all the way through, separating Horror's right arm from her torso at the shoulder. Raine lifted the severed limb, folded it at the elbow, and quickly wrapped it in one of the towels, hiding it away. The stump barely bled at all, exactly like Horror's neck.

Extracting Horror's heart was more of a challenge. Raine didn't have a bone saw to break through the sternum or the ribcage, so she cut into the soft flesh just below the last of Horror's floating ribs, on the left side of her chest. She worked the point and edge of her machete inside the wound, hacking and yanking at the bottom of the ribcage; the corpse produced the most awful sounds of ripping and sucking, fluids and blood spilling forth, meat ripping and tearing. I had to turn away and gag when Raine stuck her whole hand and wrist inside the massive wound, but then I turned back, forcing myself to bear witness.

"There you are," Raine grunted, gritting her teeth, almost elbow-deep inside a still-warm corpse. "Just a biiiitt more, come on, come on. There!"

Raine yanked. A ripping sound made the corpse jerk. Raine pulled her hand free, holding a fist-sized lump of bloody flesh, trailing the ends of several flapping meaty tubes.

It didn't look much like a heart. It was just a rose-red lump of steaming, bleeding, quivering meat. But I trusted Raine's judgement. She bundled up Horror's heart in the second towel, tied it into a tight package, then used the third towel to wipe the worst of the blood off her hands and forearm.

"Good girl, Raine," I said, taking slow, steady, deep breaths to still my own queasy stomach. "Good girl, well done, that was ... difficult. Oh my gosh, that was the most disgusting thing we've ever done. Oh my gosh. Oh, we did not just do that. Oh."

Raine cracked a grin and shot me a wink, wiping the sticky crimson mess off her machete with the spare towel. "Not difficult for me, sweet thing."

"Bloody hell," Twil grunted, wheeling Evelyn back around. "The sounds were bad enough!"

Evelyn huffed, looking pale and green. "Stop talking about the sounds. Stop talking about it at all, please—"

A sudden and unexpected voice interrupted us all, filling the sunny air of the woodland clearing.

“Don’t you girls know that it’s very rude to take other people’s things without permission?”

I jumped about a foot in the air, swallowing a scream. Raine spun, machete out, ready for the one thing we’d all silently agreed not to discuss. Evelyn clutched at the armrests of her wheelchair. Twil swore, loudly and creatively and with several mentions of female genitalia.

Horror’s head — her severed head, perched on a mass of broken roof fragments — stared at us, waiting for an answer. She blinked several times. Her lips opened, drooling a thin trickle of blood from both corners of her mouth.

“It’s stealing,” she said. Her voice bubbled with the blood in her throat, gummy and moist. “Theft. Very naughty. Technically a crime, though I suspect that’s the least of your criminal worries at present, considering what you’ve just done.”

I stared at it — at her? At Horror? — with my mouth hanging open in shock. Raine reacted with much more practical considerations in mind; she turned and kicked the corpse itself to make sure it wasn’t about to get up and walk around. The corpse did not so much as twitch. Twil started laughing, panting for breath, muttering ‘fuck me, fuck me’. Evelyn hissed between her teeth, almost growling with frustration.

“We ... ” I said, trying to gather my voice. “We all knew this might happen! Everybody stay calm!”

Twil shouted at the head: “How are you talking without any fucking lungs?! You haven’t got any air up in your pipes!”

“This is a dream, or a play,” Evelyn growled through her teeth. “Forget logic, Twil. Think narratively.”

Raine lifted her machete again. “Oh, I’m thinking narratively alright. Sweet thing, say the word and I’ll scoop out whatever’s left of her.”

Horror’s eyes flicked back and forth as we spoke, eyebrows raised with the distinct air of a very unimpressed adult watching a group of children attempting to hide the evidence of a failed practical joke. She waited until we all trailed off, all of us staring down at her severed head.

“Well,” she said. “I’m glad you girls are having so much fun with this. But I assure you, this little jaunt is far from over, and I am far from finished with you all.”

bedlam boundary – 24.21

Horror's severed head — emancipated from her shoulders and perched upon a pile of red plastic roof fragments, with trailing tendrils of blonde hair spilling from her loosened bun, and twin tracks of blood drying upon her chin like a pair of long red fangs — finished the delivery of her not-so-veiled threat, closed her blood-slick mouth with a soft wet click, and awaited our response.

We five — myself, Raine, Evelyn, Twil, and the Praem Plushie tucked up inside Evelyn's dressing gown — braced for absolute, unthinkable, screaming madness.

Eyes darted left and right, checking our collective backs and the perimeter of the woodland clearing. Raine kicked Horror's corpse again, watching carefully for any sign of movement, knuckles tight on her machete. Twil sniffed the air in rapid little motions, wolf ears perked high and alert, bushy tail gone stiff. I wished dearly for all my tentacles, or even just one, tipped with bio-steel and dripping paralytic toxin; I wished my left shin was not throbbing like a headache in my calf muscle, drawing all my energy downward as if sucking my blood into the earth; I wished Evelyn was not forced to shrink down into her wheelchair, helpless and afraid, relying so closely on the rest of us to protect her. Seeing her afraid was worse than my own fear.

Seconds ticked by. Twil swallowed loudly. Raine turned on the spot. Horror's head pursed her lips and raised her eyebrows.

Warm sunshine beat downward through the woodland canopy, falling from the sunless sky of the Eye's gnarled and wrinkled underside; a soft breeze trickled through the leaves, tickling the hairs on the back of my neck, helping to dry my damp clothes. Beyond our little clearing and the shattered ruins of the pavilion, the woods themselves were cloaked in a blanket of total silence, unbroken by birdsong or furtive scurrying or the sound of insects.

Horror's apparent threat did not result in the appearance and arrival of half a dozen armed nurses or Knightly security guards, nor in the sudden eruption of the woods into a teeming menagerie of implausible monsters. Her corpse did not rise to its undead feet; her head did not grow legs and rush toward, nor did her eyes glow like warning lights and attack us with superhero heat vision from her rather reduced position down on the ground.

In short, nothing happened.

"I think we're in the clear," I hissed. "I think Horror was being rhetorical."

Raine let out a long sigh, spun her machete in one hand, and gestured at Horror's head again. "Heather, sweet thing, you give me the go ahead and I'll crack open her skull and cut out her brains. There's no way she can survive that. No way."

Evelyn snorted loudly, sitting up straighter in her wheelchair, rousing herself from the swamp of sudden fear. "That kind of logic will not serve us well here. Give it up, Raine."

"Yes," I said, trying to sound diplomatic. "Raine, please wait. She's not exactly dangerous right now. Unless she starts screaming for help or something, I suppose."

Twil hissed, "Don't give her ideas!"

"S-sorry," I stammered. "I just— this is a little— well, you can see for yourself." I gestured at Horror's severed head. "I'm having a little bit of trouble thinking around this."

Horror sighed, then tutted softly; how she achieved the necessary motions for either of those things, I had no idea.

"You girls may believe whatever you prefer," she said, her voice a wet gurgle of clotted blood. "But ignoring reality will not help anybody out of this mess you've created. I assure you, even like this I am more than capable of standing up for myself."

"... was that intentional?" I asked.

Horror frowned delicately. "Excuse me?"

"Standing up for yourself," I echoed. "You can't be serious. That has to be on purpose."

"Bloody hell," Evelyn grunted. "Please, Heather. Don't encourage this."

Twil butted in, leaning past Evee. "You're a head! What are you gonna do to us, huh? Roll over here and bite me in the ankles?"

“Don’t you give it ideas either, Twil,” Evelyn said. “You’ve seen The Thing, I know you have. I thought you’d have a more expansive imagination regarding the potential of a disembodied head.”

Twil opened her mouth to retort, then paused and went pale. Her big bushy tail had been wagging with excited agitation, but suddenly it stopped dead. Her wolf ears went flat as well. She stared at Horror’s head with renewed caution, baring her teeth and narrowing her eyes. “Shiiiiit,” she hissed. “You don’t think it could do that, right? Like, not for real, right? Shit, don’t give it ideas, Evee!”

Evelyn rolled her eyes. “That is exactly what I just said to you. Keep up.”

“I’m sorry,” I said. “But I have no idea what you’re talking about. ‘The Thing’?”

Twil grimaced at me. “It’s an old horror movie. With this like—”

“Don’t,” Evelyn snapped. “Heather is more intimately connected to the logic of the dream than we are, as far as our best guesses. The less she knows about that, the better. Don’t put ideas in her head either.”

Twil shrugged. “Sorry, Big H. We can have a movie night when we’re out of this shit.”

I frowned down at Horror’s head, trying not to imagine the possibilities, but it was too late; Twil and Evelyn being needlessly cryptic had already filled my mind’s eye with vile potential. Perhaps the head would grow massive and roll after us like a big fleshy boulder. Or maybe it would whip out a gigantic tongue, barbed with venomous spikes. Or perhaps it would sprout spider-like legs from the ragged hole of the neck, and skitter through the trees in pursuit as we fled.

None of those things happened either; Horror just stared at us with an unimpressed frown.

Raine said: “I still want to finish it off for real. We could burn the brains. Turn her to ash.”

“Yeah!” Twil said. “I’m with crazy-mode Raine on this one. Let’s fucking kill it again! Come on! Finish it off like a vampire or some shit!”

“Can everybody just stop for a moment?” I said, raising both my hands. My left shin hurt so badly that I was having trouble thinking. “This is a golden opportunity, don’t you see? We have Horror ... ‘incapacitated’, to put it lightly. We can ask her whatever we want. We could find out exactly where Maisie is being held. Or where the other six of me have gotten to. Please, don’t finish her off, not yet.”

“Huh,” Evelyn grunted. “I don’t think that’s very likely. She’s not going to tell us anything.”

“Quite!” Horror announced, her throat emitting a slick wet gurgle up through her mouth. “If you think I’m going to assist you girls in your petty act of rebellion, then you can think again. I shan’t be providing you with any information on the workings of the hospital, nor the staff schedules, or internal layouts of non-patient areas, or —”

“What are you?” I said.

Horror stopped, blinked several times, then squinted in concerned confusion. “Excuse me?”

Her voice was almost genuine, as if worried that a kind and gentle patient had finally gone over the edge into true delusion and insanity. Even her squinty frown hinted at true compassion. The hook was always baited, even when she was just a head.

“It’s a very simple question,” I said slowly. “And I would like you to answer it to the best of your abilities. What are you?”

Horror bit her lower lip. “Oh. Oh, Heather. Oh, you poor thing you —”

“What are you?” I repeated again, louder and harder than I had intended, my temper fraying quicker than I expected. Pain was making me rash. “I’m not even asking a metaphysical question, not yet. We’ve separated your head from your body, yet you’re still alive and still talking. Twil made a very good point earlier — there’s no air moving across your vocal chords in order to make sound. You’re clearly not a human being, or if you are then you’re very different to most human beings, who generally can’t survive decapitation. So, Horror, if that even is your real name, please answer my question. What are you?”

Evelyn sighed. “Heather, none of this is real. She doesn’t have to obey physical constraints.”

I held up a gentle hand toward Evee. “Yes, but if we’re talking to her, we need to work within the boundaries of the dream. Let her answer.”

Horror’s lip-bite turned into a deep grimace, followed by a sigh through her nose. The whole head twitched sideways, as if trying to tilt upon her detached neck.

“I’m a nurse, Heather,” she said. “I’ve always been your nurse.”

I rolled my eyes. “Right, technically correct, which is the worst kind of correct. Or is this a metaphor? ‘Horror’ is the nurse which delivered my life to me?”

Twil snorted. “Human beings don’t keep talking after having their heads ripped off. Come on, you fuckin’ roly-poly ball. How are you like that and not dead yet?”

A wry little smile creased Horror’s lips. “You’ve clearly never met very many exceptional human beings, Miss Hopton.”

Raine picked her way across the wreckage of the collapsed pavilion, until she towered over Horror’s severed head. Horror tried to look up at Raine, but her eyes could only roll so far and her head could not tilt backward.

“Raine,” I said gently, warning her off. “Please don’t. We can get something useful out of her, I’m certain.”

“I’m gonna pick her up,” Raine said. “Not in the way I’d prefer, of course.”

I winced. “Be careful!”

“Yeah,” Twil laughed. “Watch out for the teeth, she might bite!”

Raine reached down, grabbed a fistful of Horror’s thick blonde hair, and lifted the severed head from its perch. The ragged stump of her neck did not drip blood as she rose, clean and dry, nothing like a meaty, flesh remnant of a person who had just died. A nub-end of white spine dangled from within the torn flesh. I felt a little nauseated, but managed to resist the urge to avert my gaze. Evelyn swallowed loudly. Twil went, “Ugh!” and spat on the ground.

Raine lifted Horror until they could meet eye-to-eye, then cracked a grin. “Hey there, nurse. Not exactly how I wanted to get up close and intimate with you, slam-piggy. But hey, up close like this, do I make you feel ... light-headed?"

"Raine!" I spluttered. "Don't flirt with a severed head! That's disgusting."

Evelyn let out a long grumbly sigh. "No, no, she has a point. However loathe I am to admit so."

"A point about what?!"

"About undermining whatever is going on here," Evelyn said. "Raine's insults appeared to work, earlier. But I draw the line at puns. Do not do that again, Raine."

"I'm not so sure they were meant as insults," I muttered.

Horror pursed her lips at Raine. "I'll thank you not to be so crass when I'm in such a vulnerable position, Miss Haynes. I thought you were the 'gentlemanly' type of butch lesbian, always willing to help a girl in need, always there to leap in and be strong and dependable when one of your conquests needs you. Does that not extend to me? I have been conquered, after all, haven't I?"

"You don't count," Raine said. "And I ain't sticking my fingers into your neck hole, either."

"I think you will find my neck hole is none of your— excuse me?!"

Horror burst into a splutter of outrage as Raine lifted her further and then peered at the underside of her severed neck, eyeing the mass of ragged flesh. Raine shrugged and lowered Horror again, then glanced over at the rest of us. "Very little blood," she said. "Spine's severed real neat, too. Doesn't really match the violence of Twil ripping her head off."

Twil blinked twice, wolf-ears swivelling, then muttered, "Um, sorry?"

Evelyn frowned at her. "You don't remember doing that?"

"Nah. I mean, yeah, I do," Twil said. "I remember it perfect like, but uh, sorry if I fucked up somehow?"

"Not what I meant," Raine said. "Not your fault or anything. Just weird. Here, come on, nurse-bot. Not that you've got any choice."

Raine ambled over to the rest of us, holding the head high enough so we could all see Horror's expression — pursed lips going white with anger, brow furrowed hard and deep, eyes tight and narrow. Raine stopped a good few feet away, severed head outstretched in one hand, machete held low in the other, forearms still stained with faint crimson from butchering Horror's corpse. Though she had not claimed the kill herself, she looked like a hound who had brought her mistress the severed head of her slain foe. My throat closed up and my heart fluttered at that sight; part of me wished I had my real life mobile phone, so that I might capture the moment forever with a camera. But making electronic records of murder and butchery was probably not a very good idea, even in a dream.

"Thank you for fetching her, Raine," I said. "Good girl."

"You wanna interrogate her?" Raine said. "Go right ahead."

Evelyn groaned.

Horror let out a sharp little sigh. "Murder, theft, gross bodily harm. Mishandling a corpse, desecrating the dead, unlawful removal of organs. And now kidnapping! And you girls are worried about bad puns? You are in so much trouble I don't think you realise how deep you've gotten, you—"

"Technically it's abduction," Evelyn snapped. "It's only kidnapping if we demand a ransom for you. And it's only abduction in the first place if we take you somewhere without your consent. Do you want us to toss you back on the pile of rubble? You're quite welcome to it, I doubt we're going to use it again."

Horror closed her mouth and squinted at Evelyn.

"Thought not," said Eevee.

"I see your father's legal habits have rubbed off on you, Miss Saye," said Horror. "How very equivocationary of you. It's a pity you can't put those talents to use in service of society instead of—"

"What are you even doing?" I said. "What is this?"

Horror's eyes flickered to me. She couldn't turn her head, so Raine adjusted her angle.

"Giving my thoughts on the current situation," said Horror. "What else is there to do in my regrettable condition?"

"You're taunting us, or trying to taunt us, though rather ineffectually. You've got bits and pieces of Raine's innermost anxieties, and also Eevee's apparently, but you're acting sloppy, not using your techniques very well. I think we've broken you, whatever you actually are. We've broken your purpose in the dream. Haven't we? What are you?"

"I already told you, Heather!" Horror tutted. "I'm a nurse. I'm your nurse!"

"I fuckin' hate this," said Twil. Her wolf ears had gone limp, same as her tail. "When you beat a mid-boss, it should either stay dead, or get up again with a second health bar. This is just bollocks. Come on, Big H, let Raine finish her off."

"I doubt that would work," I said, staring into Horror's unimpressed eyes. "We overcame her once, but the dream doesn't want her removed. The script, the play, whatever it is, it's worked around her defeat in order to keep her going. I'm sorry to be so absurd about this, Twil, but I suspect if we cut her head open and finished her off, she might come back as an actual ghost. Or something even worse. At least like this she's easy enough to contain."

"Contain?" Horror echoed, pulling a scrunchy frown. "Contain!? What are you going to do now, girls? Tie me up? Drag me along on your adventure? Oh no, absolutely not. I think you will find me a most uncooperative captive."

I sighed at her. "Yes. You're hardly a lady of infinite jest and most excellent fancy, are you?"

Horror frowned at me with incomprehension. "I'm sorry?"

I smiled in a tiny victory. "Hm."

"Heather?" Evelyn said.

"Yeah," Twil added. "What was that, some kind of code?"

"Sweet thing?" Raine said. "Clue us in?"

"Shakespeare," I said, still smiling. "Well, misquoting Hamlet, actually. There's no way to test for sure, of course, but I'm trying to figure out what exactly Horror is. If her origin lay with me, there's no way she wouldn't know that line. She would have responded in some fashion, she would have recognised Shakespeare. I ... I think?"

Twil said, "Big H, like, I respect you and all, but that is some mad unscientific bullshit.”

“I know,” I said with a sigh. “But it’s a start.”

“You got a theory on what she is, then?” Twil asked. “Or why the hell she’s still talking to us, like?”

Evelyn broke in before I could answer, with something I had not figured out: “She’s an element of the dream, and we have adjusted that dream. That’s why she’s still talking.” Evelyn glanced around at the rest of us, wearing an expression like this should be obvious. “Think about it for a moment. We’ve just redefined the dream, rewritten the tone and the atmosphere, by waking Twil.”

Twil pointed at herself. Her tail wagged from side to side. “Eh, what? Me?”

“Yes, you,” Evelyn said. “Because you’re a werewolf.”

Twil frowned. “Eh? What does that have to do with a severed head still talking?”

“You’re both horror genre elements,” Evelyn drawled. “Ha! Ironical right? ‘Horror’ genre? Maybe that was on purpose. Heather should understand this, even if you don’t. We’ve introduced two new elements to the dream, a werewolf and a murder, and the dream has reacted accordingly. Not to even mention whatever the ‘Lillies’ brought with them, though that element does seem to be purged for now. Regardless, we’ve shifted the genre of Sevens’ ‘script’. We caused this.” She gestured at Horror’s severed head. “We solved one problem by introducing an entirely new category of problem.” She huffed. “Typical of us, I suppose.”

Horror said, “Well, I’m glad you realise your own powerlessness, at least.”

“Oh, we’re far from powerless,” I said. “Evee just spelled it out. We’ve redefined part of the dream, part of the genre. And you, you can’t even acknowledge that with your words, because you’re not actually a person.”

Horror raised her eyebrows.

Twil, however, drew a wincing breath between her teeth. Her tail was coiled upward behind her back. “Woah, woah, Big H, hold up a sec here. I know this is a dream and all, but like ... isn’t that a bit of a slippery slope? Kill her, sure. Cut pieces off her to feed to Zheng, alright, fine. But like, she's still a person, yeah? Don't go down that road, yeah?"

"Not in this case," I said, speaking to Horror. "Because I think I've figured out what we're looking at. I think Horror may be part of the Eye."

Raine tilted her head in silent question. Twil scrunched her forehead into an uncomprehending frown.

Evelyn muttered, "Haven't we already identified the Eye's personal avatar?"

"Yeah," said Raine. "And she's a lot hotter than Horror here."

"Huh!" Horror spluttered.

"Well, yes," I said, then spluttered too, correcting myself. "Um, I mean— uh, yes, we've identified her, indeed. Not yes she's hotter than Horror. Not that— I— no, I refuse to make a judgement on that." I huffed, abandoning the subject. Raine cracked a grin and winked at me. Evelyn just rolled her eyes. I rallied back to the real topic. "Seriously, think about everything we've seen here so far. We now have three examples of people split into multiple parts by the dream. Myself, first off. Then Praem, who's been split in two. And now Twil, who was in three, and now reunited back into one. Who's to say the Eye hasn't been subjected to the same process? The 'science gill' we saw, maybe she's the ego of the eye, the primary decision maker, the personality. And the nurses — or rather, the whole institution of Cygnet Hospital — is the id, or superego, or maybe both?"

"Don't sound so sure," Evelyn said.

I cleared my throat, feeling self-conscious. "I haven't decided yet, but it makes sense."

"No it don't," Twil said. "Come on, Big H, is that what they're teaching you in English lit or something? Id, ego, all that shit? Freud wasn't actually right, you know? It's all a metaphor or something."

"Yes, yes, I know that, but I'm using it as a metaphor. We've been puzzling over what the nurses are, what they embody, or represent. Our current working theory about the patients — not that I can be sure — is that they're all the people and places the Eye has absorbed and trapped in Wonderland, turned into metaphorical human beings, though most of them are probably Outsiders totally beyond our imaginations. But what are the nurses? Eye cultists? I don't think that makes any sense. Nobody has 'loyalty' to the Eye. The institution, the nurses, all of it — what if all of that is the Eye? Including Horror."

Horror listened to my theory with a curiously bored expression. We all peered at her, as if expecting her to crack under the pressure of detailed interrogation. But I knew she wouldn't. She couldn't. It wasn't that she didn't care, or that she was just that mentally tough, or unafraid of us, or anything like that. No, she simply could not 'crack' under discovery. She was her role in full, not simply a player upon the stage, following Sevens' script or the Eye's unfolding mind. The dream would not let her die. She was a primary component, and could not be removed.

Eventually she cleared her throat and said, "You girls are very creative, I will give you that. I'm actually rather impressed by all this fantasy. But unfortunately it's very unhealthy to let you run away with these fictional models of the world." She sighed heavily and focused on me. "Heather, I had held out hope that you were being led astray by your friends, but now I discover to my dismay that you are the ringleader. I didn't expect this. I'm very ... " Her eyes scrunched with mocking sorrow. "I'm very disappointed. Very concerned. You must give up on this. The only way out is to head back indoors and give yourself up. It will be painful and scary at first, but in the long run it is the right thing to do, both for others and for yourself."

Evelyn snorted. "And she's still like a broken record."

"Yeah, shit." Twil laughed a little. "She's not exactly convincing. What the hell was I scared of?"

"Horror," I said. "Look at me, please."

Horror looked.

Horror's eyes were slightly bloodshot, as if she'd had a long day at work. The trailing strands of her hair and the twin tracks of blood from the corners of her mouth made her look like the head of a giant comedy spider. Her eyebrows kinked upward as I stared — and stared and stared and stared, testing my theory in a new and instinctive way, gripped by an impulse I could not explain. The others had fallen silent. I felt their eyes on me, but I didn't look away. My own eyes began to water slightly as I resisted the growing urge to blink. Raine watched me carefully, like a loyal hound who realised her mistress was working on some greater plan.

The sunshine was beating down upon us now, as if the storm's passing had cleared the atmosphere for a true summer's day. My hair was mostly dry and even my sodden slippers were starting to feel less mushy. Beneath my yellow blanket and my ugly brown jumper, I felt sweat prickle under my armpits and down my back.

Was this merely the effect of the warmer air? Or was I locked in a staring contest with a portion of the very thing we had come to Wonderland to stare back into?

The wound in my left shin throbbed harder and harder with every heartbeat. Wordless silence and protracted concentration gave my mind no distractions to spare me from the aching cut in my flesh, surrounded by stiff muscles and barely-healing tissues. I felt myself begin to buckle, listing to one side, eyes open and watering with effort.

A hand reached out and steadied me — strong as steel, soft as velvet, unerringly there at my side. I straightened up, drawing on that aid, until my chin was once again held high and my eyes were wide. Horror could not escape.

"You're going to help us," I said. "Whether you like it or not."

Horror blinked.

I let out a ragged breath and finally rubbed at my watering eyes, blinking hard to clear my vision. The powerful supporting grip left my arm, but now I could stand on my own feet, though the pain in my shin was still distracting me and threatening to scramble my thoughts.

"Ahh, ow." I winced. "Oh, I think that might have given me a headache as well. Thank you, uh—"

I glanced to my left, to confirm who had helped me, assuming that the firm grip had belonged to Twil; after all, Raine was holding the severed head aloft and Evee was down in her wheelchair, her meagre strength in reality reduced by the cruelty of the dream.

But nobody was there. Twil was still beyond arm's reach, both hands firmly on the handles of Eevee's wheelchair. Evelyn's hands were tucked deep within the folds of her grey dressing gown. Raine was in front of me, at the wrong angle.

The Praem Plushie was peering over the right-hand arm of Evelyn's wheelchair, regarding me with flat, disc-shaped, inanimate eyes.

"Oh," I croaked. "Thank you, Praem."

"Eh?" Twil blinked. "Hey?"

"Heather, what—" Evelyn started to say, then noticed that the Praem Plushie had somehow gotten out from inside the protective swaddling of Eevee's dressing gown. "How did she get there?" Evelyn tutted, picked Praem up, and returned her to a safer place, snuggled down in Eevee's lap.

"Heather," Raine purred. "What just happened?"

"Nothing," I said, straightening up again. "Just my leg wound bothering me, it's ... it hurts, a lot. Praem offered some moral support."

Evelyn grunted a vague affirmative; Raine nodded seriously, accepting the strangeness of the situation without further question. Twil grimaced as if we'd all gone mad.

Horror cleared her throat gently, and said: "It is admirable that you girls stick so closely together. Even in the most dire of circumstances, from which you cannot possibly hope to extricate yourselves, you soldier on, shoulder to shoulder. This kind of solidarity would serve you well in life. Mm. What a pity, what a pity ... "

Twil pulled a big squinty frown. "Is it just me, or has she changed her tune a bit? That was almost like a compliment."

"I won the staring contest," I said.

"And what does that mean?" Twil asked.

"I don't know, actually."

Evelyn said: "Every act is a redefinition of the dream, a new line in Sevens' bloody play. Go on, Heather. What are you thinking?"

I took a deep breath, then stared into Horror's eyes again. This time she blinked right away. Surrender.

“She keeps trying to get us back on track,” I said slowly, thinking out loud, piecing together disparate notions as I went. “Not our track, but her one, the original script for the dream. She wants us to surrender ourselves, give up, return to the insides of Cygnet Hospital, so on and so on. She’s a narrative device to re-route us whenever we start to stray. Look at how she kept turning up whenever I would get close to freeing somebody or achieving something. But now we’ve neutralised her, we’ve written her into a corner. The dream won’t let her go, won’t let her be dead or gone or whatever. But she can’t do anything else except keep attempting to return us to the original path. She’s a bit like the Eye, in that respect. When observation is all you can do, you’ll keep doing it, no matter what. Horror was telling the truth when she answered my first question. She is a nurse.”

Evelyn cleared her throat. “This is all very plausible, Heather, but what use is it to us?”

“Where is my sister?” I said to Horror. “Where’s Maisie?”

Horror frowned. “You know that already. You know exactly where —”

“Answer the question, please.”

Horror sighed, paused, then said, “In the Box.”

“And what is ‘the Box’?”

Horror blinked in surprise. “Are you being silly with me, Heather?”

“I assure you, I am being completely serious. What is the Box? Please answer.”

Horror’s eyes glanced at Twil and Eevee, then back at me. She tried to roll her eyes upward into her head so she could look at Raine, but that was an impossible feat for a severed head. Finally she looked back at me, and spoke slowly and gently, with the kind of care one reserved for small children or the very sick.

“The Box is the most high security part of Cygnet Hospital,” she said. “It has several names, some of them official, but the staff all call it ‘the Box’. It’s the reason all of the rest of the hospital exists, after all, at least legally and administratively. The rest of the hospital is an afterthought by comparison. The Box is a kind of special containment facility, for those very few and very unlucky girls who are simply too dangerous to ever rejoin society. They're packaged up in there, with no way out. Like a sealed box. You must have seen the entrances, Heather? I was told you were wandering around, clearly looking for them, and I know you blundered into at least one. You've even spoken to some of the guards, though they were very circumspect and closed-lipped about that particular encounter."

"I remember. And that's a good sign, by the way," I added for the others. "The Knights keep trying to protect us, which is good."

"Huh," Raine grunted. "This 'Box', is it even more high security than the prison?"

"Yes," I said. "Big sci-fi style vault door. I ran into it earlier, just once. I think there's external entrances too, all guarded by the Knights. If Lozzie's revolt works and we can get the Knights openly on our side, we might be able to get into the Box without too much trouble."

Horror said, "I wouldn't be too certain of that."

"What else is in the Box?" I asked. "What kind of security? What are we talking about here, cameras and blast doors, or laser guns, or something else?"

Horror let out a little sigh. "I'm afraid I can't say."

"Answer the question, please."

"I'm afraid I can't say."

Raine raised her machete and caught my eye, asking a silent question. I shook my head. "No, Raine. I don't think torture will even work. Horror, why can't you say?"

Horror smiled, a little awkwardly. "I'm only allowed to take a set course inside the Box. I'm not allowed to deviate, or ask questions. I even have to hand over my mobile phone before I enter! Can you imagine that? It's like being inside a nuclear missile silo or something, like on that one show with the people underground? No? Oh well, you'd know the one if you'd seen it. All very serious stuff. So no, I can't say what they might have in there. I can tell you that your sister is not the only resident of the Box, but that's all, really."

"And Maisie is in there?"

“Yes. I’m not lying. You already knew this, Heather, you knew all of this, you—”

“There are six more of me,” I said. “Six more Heathers. Where are they? Are they in the Box, too?”

Horror let out a terrible sigh. “Oh, Heather. You are so very alone. There’s no—” “Where is the Director’s office?” I skipped straight to the next question, trying to disorient her.

Horror raised her eyebrows. “The Director? You’ve got no business seeing the Director. She won’t be interested in you at all—”

“Where is her office?” I repeated.

Horror paused, rolled her eyes, then sighed. “I don’t suppose you can do any more damage there. Very well. The Director’s office is in the second basement level, just below the laundry rooms. You can reach it easily from the main staff room. There’s a lock on the door, though. Ordinary staff have no business down there and—”

“And where is the Governor’s office?” I said.

Horror stopped.

For a single second it was as if her head was finally, truly, actually dead. The jaw hung slack. The eyes went glassy. Tension left the muscles in her cheeks and around her mouth. A single droplet of blood fell from the stump of her neck and landed upon the wood chips.

“Horror?” I said.

The nurse’s skull animated again with a gulp, nervously wetting her lips with a flicker of bloody tongue. She blinked rapidly, light returning inside her eyes.

“You don’t want to speak with the Governor, Heather,” she said. “For your own good. You don’t want to do that.”

“Where is the Governor’s office?” I repeated. “Answer the—”

“I know, I know!” Horror said, her whole tone switching from exasperated adult to almost pleading. “I’ve not exactly endeared myself to you with the things I’ve said, and I’m loathe to help you in this absurd quest you’ve dreamed up for yourselves, but you do not want to speak with the Governor. I don't even know why I'm telling you this, really!"

I opened my mouth to push again, but Evelyn said, "Heather, wait. You, Horror, whatever you are. Why don't we want to speak with the Governor?"

Horror swallowed, eyebrows knitting as if considering her answer with great care. "It is exceedingly difficult to get her full attention. She's always so distracted. But once she's aware of you, she never forgets you. And she has all the power in the hospital, in the end. If she distractedly decides that your time here is up, then poof! You're done! Hiring and firing, disciplinary actions, job title changes, all of it! She can have patients removed and moved around at will. Whole wings re-assigned for new purposes. And the worst part is that she's not even really interested! She doesn't care! She's got some special project involving all the patient data, past and present, and that's all she cares about. So she makes decisions on a whim, and you do not want to be in the way of that." Horror sighed. "Though I suppose you don't care anyway, do you? You're already criminals now. Oh, dear. What am I saying?"

We all shared a concerned glance. Twil grimaced, wolf ears flat, tail raised and wrapped around her own arm. Evelyn sucked on her own teeth, drumming her fingers on the arm of her wheelchair. The Praem Plushie seemed to peer out of her grey dressing gown, examining Horror.

Raine just nodded slowly, and said, "Well, Miss Gilf Eyeball has already seen us. So we've got no problem there."

Horror said, "She must not have been paying proper attention to you. I'm telling you girls, you do not want—"

A sudden shout echoed through the woods, somewhere far off to the right of our little clearing; the voice sounded neither urgent nor panicked, though the exact words were lost on the gentle sunlit breeze.

We all froze. A moment later another voice answered — words once again a wood-choked blur, but undeniably an affirmative of some kind.

"Shit, shit!" Twil hissed. Her tail was standing straight up, fur all a-bristle. "Who the fuck is that?!"

“Nurses,” Raine said, calm and collected but speaking quickly. “Or guards. Or worse. They’re looking for us. Looking for Horror. Time to move.”

Evelyn snapped, “We need to get under the cover of the Fadestone, quickly. Or get out of here!”

Horror sighed. A certain smug gloss returned to her expression. “I told you girls, there is no way out of this predicament which you have created. If you would only—”

“What do we do with her, then!?” Twil jerked a thumb at Horror’s talking head.

“We take her with us,” I said.

“Eh!?”

“Oh, great,” Evelyn grumbled. “I was expecting that.”

“We take her with us,” I repeated. “Leaving her here is not an option. For all we know whoever is on their way might be able to glue her back together or reanimate her or something.”

“We can stop her from re-spawning,” Raine said. “Quick thinking.”

“Yes, I ... I think? And at least this way we’ll know exactly where she is.”

“Excuse me!” Horror said. “May I—”

“We can’t take the whole corpse with us!” Twil said, gesturing at the rest of Horror’s now very mangled body, missing one arm, chest cut open, covered in blood and viscera. “That’s gonna get found! It’s not like there’s a convenient locker to stuff it in, either!”

Evelyn snorted. “Can’t you dig a hole, Twil? What good are your claws for?”

“Yeah,” Twil said, sneering. “Cos obviously I know all about digging holes in, oh, what, sixty seconds?!”

“It’s fine!” I said. “We can leave the corpse here. The head is the part that’s still alive. That’s all we need.”

“Excuse me?” said Horror. “I would like to—”

“Hey,” said Raine, cracking a grin. “What’s one more corpse? We’re already wanted women, after all. I’m used to that. All women want me.”

Twil and Eevee both groaned. The Praem Plushie vanished inside Eevee’s grey dressing gown. I just blushed.

“Raine,” I said. “We need to move, quickly. Can you ... ?”

Raine cracked another grin just for me, then nodded. “On it, sweet thing.”

Horror started talking again as Raine walked back toward the corpse, over to the two neatly wrapped packages — Horror’s served arm and stolen heart.

“You girls should be surrendering yourselves to the proper authorities!” she snapped. Raine reached down and grabbed the third towel, the one she’d used to wipe the blood off her hands. “I shan’t be providing you with further help or directions or even so much as a- mffff! Mm-mmm-mfff! Mm—”

Horror’s words choked into silence on the folds of the towel Raine stuffed into her mouth. Raine then quickly bundled up the head inside the rest of the towel and tied the ends together to create a neat little sphere. She grabbed the other wrapped packages, the bloody parcels which contained Horror’s severed right arm and the meaty lump of her heart. Then she crossed back to the wheelchair and grabbed a final towel, using it to fashion a sling for all three of the wrapped-up pieces of Horror’s body. She positioned the sling over her own back, then filled it with arm and head and heart, so the grisly packages would not be revealed by a curious glance.

“Cool, cool,” Twil said. “Not fucked up at all, not fucked up, nope, nope. Not thinking about it. Not thinking—”

Another shout echoed through the woods — still distant, but closer this time. Whoever or whatever that was, they would be here within minutes.

My left shin throbbed with each beat of my heart; even fresh adrenaline was not enough to quieten the wound now. I took slow, deep, difficult breaths. No time to rest.

Raine reached over and fished Horror’s stolen keys out of the canvas bag on the back of Evelyn’s wheelchair. “Ladies and squid-girls, wolves and magicians, we got the keys to go anywhere. And the invisibility trick to get there without getting seen. We need to find an infirmary or something, some kind of sick-bay, for Heather.”

“Zheng first,” I repeated my previous instructions.

“Yeah,” Twil agreed. “I wanna get Evee indoors, get her dried off proper.”

“I’m fine!” Evelyn grunted. “And this isn’t real damp, none of it’s going to kill me.”

“We’ll never get that wheelchair up the stairs to Zheng’s room,” I said gently. I reached over and braced one hand against Raine’s shoulder, so as not to sag to my left, easing my weight off the wound in my shin. “So I think we’re going to have to split up temporarily. Twil, I want you to wait with Evee, somewhere ... we’ll find somewhere. Raine and I will head to Zheng’s room with the meat, and try to free her.”

“Hey, what?” Twil said. “Nah, Big H, come on, we all just got together again! We gotta stay grouped up proper. And that leg of yours is right fucked. Stop trying to hide it, we can all see.”

I shook my head, taking deep breaths to force down the pain. “Twil, we can’t get that wheelchair up those stairs, even if we will be invisible. And the access lift is a coffin full of rust, I’m not risking that.”

Raine said, “Sweet thing, let me go do it myself. I can move faster than you. Sneaking missions are kinda my thing right now. And your leg—”

I shook my head again. “No. It’s Zheng. It has to be me and you, Raine. Not just one of us. It has to be us, both, both of us, both ... ”

Raine looked down at me, smiling gently. “Heather, that leg is—”

“Raine, you are a good girl and I love you. We need to free Zheng, ASAP. All this is snowballing faster than we can manage, and we have to be ready for the next stage of Lozzie’s revolution. We need Zheng free.”

“Sweet thing,” Raine purred. “With these keys we can find a proper infirmary and get you stitched—”

“Infirmary later,” I hissed.

Another muffled call and response rang out through the woods behind us. I reached for Evee’s wheelchair, to complete the circuit for the Fadestone, to make good on our escape.

“Zheng first,” I said. “Now let’s— oop!”

Raine grabbed my arm — not roughly, but with enough force to hold me back and spoil my balance. I would have gone slamming down onto my wounded leg if it wasn’t for Raine’s free hand, her support beneath my grip, her strength holding me up. I stumbled into her.

I found myself pressed against Raine’s chest, my nostrils filled with the smell of blood and sweat on her skin, my hands feeling her heartbeat beneath her ribs. Her free hand went around my back, stronger than I remembered.

Raine looked down at me, not smiling, not amused, not a good girl.

“R-Raine ... ”

“Infirmary first,” she growled. “Executive decision.”

bedlam boundary – 24.22

With the Fadestone snug in Evee's lap and the bounty of stolen keys tight in Raine's fist, sneaking back inside the looming fortress of Cygnet Hospital should have been easier than any prior penetration of that sprawling nightmare structure. The towering red brick walls which rambled out over the grounds, the hundreds of darkly staring windows like empty sockets in a skull, the corroded black metal of the many rain gutters and down-spouts like outlines upon the building's rim, the side-doors in blank brushed steel and heavy lacquered wood — even the front entrance, gaping wide and lightless upon the gnarled innards of the asylum, where nurses drifted back and forth like white-clad ghosts in the mouth of a hungry god — all should have yielded before us, we who were invisible to sight and mind, we who held the keys to every locked door and barred portal of this dream-wrought castle of medical mistreatment.

Any door that Horror's keys could not open would surely not withstand Twil's werewolf strength or the cunning ingenuity of Raine's quick hands. Though the sudden summer sun beat down upon the hospital grounds from an empty sky of wrinkled Eye-flesh, we four — or we five, including Praem — strode unseen and unknown, sliding deeper into the flesh of the hospital, like a virus in the body of the institution, cloaked against any immune system which the asylum might care to muster.

Except we didn't — stride, that is.

By the time we reached the edge of the woodland, where the shivering canopy gave way to the immaculate green lawns of Cygnet Hospital, I could barely walk.

"Heather, Heather, hey, hey! Heather!" Raine kept repeating my name, trying to keep me grounded, keep me present; but the pain was crashing higher and higher, filling my eyes with tears, choking my throat with raw panic. "Heather, just hold on tight, that's it, keep one arm around my shoulders and squeeze as hard as you gotta. Just don't let go. Don't let go. Come on, keep moving, don't let go. Across the lawns, it's only another few minutes. Heather?"

Heather, you can do it, just keep moving, keep moving.”

“I-I can’t— can’t put on weight on- ahhh! Ow, oh my God. Ah— ah! It— it hurts! It really hurts! Why does it hurt like this?! It didn’t hurt like this before!”

“The dream has changed,” Evelyn murmured, trying to stay calm in the face of my pain. “So has her wound. Raine, you keep a firm grip on both her and my wheelchair. If you lose contact you’ll lose the Fadestone’s effect.”

“Shiiiiit,” Twil hissed. “Shit shit shit! What’s wrong with her?! Big H? Yo? She was fine like five minutes ago! She was running around after me and all! Big H?”

“Don’t talk to her,” Evelyn ground out. “Let her concentrate. Everybody bloody well concentrate and stay together. Stay together and do not let go.”

The wound in my left shin — a shallow but nasty cut from a shard of glass, sustained on the previous day, when I had clambered over the broken one-way mirror to save Evelyn from the dream-spectre of her mother — was on fire.

Each heartbeat jammed knives of molten metal up through my knee and into the meat of my thigh. The lightest pressure on my foot sent fresh waves of nausea and disorientation sloshing upward into my pelvis and gut, gripping me with an intense need to vomit, which never came to fruition. A sheen of cold sweat stuck my t-shirt to my skin and my hair to my scalp and threatened to glue shut my windpipe. I rasped for the smallest volume of air, shaking and shivering, clinging to Raine like driftwood in a storm.

A deep red stain was inching outward upon the left leg of my pajama bottoms, as if the wound had burst Raine’s makeshift dressing.

By myself, I would have fallen.

Raine all but dragged me across the lawns, one-armed from the necessity of maintaining constant physical contact with Evelyn’s wheelchair. Twil took charge of pushing the chair, chewing her lips in near panic, tail tucked between her legs, wolf-ears flat and sharp. Evelyn stared straight ahead, breathing slowly and carefully, trying to sustain magic in the midst of fresh crisis.

Despite the end of the rainstorm and the sudden sunny day which had burst upon the dream, the gardens of Cygnet Hospital were deserted. No patients sat on the benches or took their outdoor lunches in the clement weather. Clusters of pale faces stared out from the upper windows of the hospital wings, sullen and frowny, gathered in protective little groups, grumpy at their confinement. The side door next to the front entrance was closed; the front entrance itself was guarded by a quartet of Knights, facing inward, as if to keep the patients from a hasty escape.

“Shit,” Twil hissed when we drew close enough to see the details. “What the hell? They tightened security? Whole place looks like it’s on lockdown.”

“We go around,” said Raine. “Side door, back door, whatever. We take the first way in we can find.”

“Sure, sure. Just—”

“Just do it, Twil,” Raine grunted. “Keep moving. Let me worry about Heather.”

For me, the journey around the left-hand side of the hospital building was a blur of pain and wheezing breath, marked only by the small adjustments of Raine’s arm around my waist, punctuated by the moments our collective feet left solid brick pathway to cross the softer surfaces of grass and soil. Screwing my eyes up tight helped with the pain for a few seconds, but that was all. Every time I tried to blot out the world, the throbbing in my head grew so much greater, and I was forced to open my eyes again, vision blurred and spinning, head pounding with internal pressure. My entire left leg had been transformed into a bag of broken glass and bone shards, shaking up and down inside my flesh with every staggering half-step.

“Tell her she can scream if she needs,” said Eevee.

“Eh? What? Eevee, what the—”

“Not you. Raine, tell her she can scream. It won’t break the Fadestone’s invisibility.”

“Heather,” Raine purred my name. “Scream if you—”

I screamed. Or perhaps I merely choked and mewled. I couldn’t be sure.

By the time we stopped before a door — an unassuming windowless slab of grey steel, blurred sideways in my vision like a smear of paste upon the brick wall — I was whining and sobbing, drool hanging from my pain-slackened lips, sagging in Raine's grasp.

"Holy shit, holy shit," Twil was hissing. "What the fuck is wrong with her?! That's just not from a fucking leg wound, that's more like — I don't know! Like a gut wound or a—"

"Get the door open," Raine said, quiet and soft and more dangerous than I had ever heard her before. "I can't let go of her. Take the keys, open the door."

"Yeah, yeah, but like, is she—"

"Open the door," Raine said. "Right now."

If I hadn't been drowning in pain and fever, Raine's tone would have sent me reeling away from her in something akin to fear — or perhaps drawn me closer, aroused beyond words. I had never heard her speak with such quivering quiet, such cold clarity of promised violence.

Twil let out a weird little canine yelp. "S-sure, sure, fine! Fuck, don't get pissed at me, Raine!"

"Sorry," said Raine, hard and sharp as fresh-cut steel.

Getting the door open took hours — or what felt like hours, as I sagged against Raine's side, my vision throbbing and darkening, my skin flushed with sweat and fever and a tidal wave of pain sloshing upward from my left leg. Twil kept trying likely-looking keys in the lock, but there were so many keys on that ring. She was forced to work one-handed, keeping her other hand on Evee's wheelchair to maintain our invisible coherency. Rattle-rattle-rattle-click-click-clink-clink-rattle-rattle — the noise of the keys and the lock and the door wormed into my head, making the pain worse, drawing a most pitiful mewling from my throat.

Eventually the lock gave way with a soft metallic thunk. Twil swung the door wide and pushed Evelyn through. Raine and myself trailed behind, anchored by Raine's other hand. We plunged into the cool darkness of a little-used passageway.

"We need to find an infirmary," Raine said. "A sickbay, something like that. Those kinds of rooms should be on the ground floor, for ease of access. Place like this should have more than one.”

“N-no ... ” I wheezed. I could barely open my eyes. “H-have to free Zheng first. We have to—”

“Heather, save your strength,” Raine purred. “Stop trying to talk.”

“But—”

“Stop talking, unless you have important information.”

“We have to—”

“Do as I say.”

The cold snap in Raine’s voice left no room for argument. If I’d been coherent I would have flinched, and most likely argued back. Raine never spoke to me that way. I rolled against her side, whining at the renewed pain radiating upward from the occluded wound in my left shin.

I was near helpless. Raine was my rock.

The walk from the edge of woods to the side of the hospital had been a confused blur, but the pain had not finished rising; the search for an infirmary was a feverish nightmare. I gave myself completely over to the guidance and protection of my friends, to the strength of Raine’s arms, to Evee’s wisdom and skill, and Twil’s wolfish instincts and boldness of heart. My vision throbbed red and black around the edges as Raine dragged me through the hospital corridors. Sweat soaked through all my clothes until I was dripping. My breath came in constricted, ragged wheezes. My eyelids drooped as we went, then fluttered shut, until I was just luggage, an insensate bag of blind pain. My leg felt like it was going to fall off — or perhaps it was already gone, and the pain I felt was the bleeding stump rubbed raw on the open air. But whenever I mustered enough lucidity to look down, there it was, hanging off me, pajama bottom leg soaking through with deep crimson.

More than once we all had to stop and step aside as groups of nurses hurried past, sticking close together, some of them carrying the same kinds of weapons that they’d used against yesterday’s riot. They couldn’t see us, of course, but we didn’t want to risk blundering into them and initiating accidental contact. We saw almost no patients down on the ground floor, as if they had all been confined to the upper levels.

Fifteen minutes — or fifteen hours, or fifteen weeks, or fifteen years of agony later, we finally passed from a corridor and into a room. I could only tell because of the change in the sound of our footsteps. The adjustment roused me enough to raise my head and pry open my eyes.

An infirmary.

I should have felt hope and relief, but the pain was too much. Thought was mostly gone.

The room looked like something from a 1950s parody. Bare wooden floorboards supported a little desk — thankfully unoccupied — along with a short row of six steel bed frames, each bed outfitted with a narrow mattress wrapped in immaculately clean and neatly pressed sheets. Tall windows punctuated the wall between the beds, the glass grimy on the outside and smeared on the inside, the light dulled and dimmed by the muck and murk. A white porcelain sink stood in the far corner, flanked by old-fashioned metal bedpans, stained and rusty. The wall opposite the beds was lined with wooden cabinets above and below a counter top, all covered in peeling white paint. Most of the cabinets were marked by big red cross symbols, like we were in one of Raine's video games. A row of bare light bulbs hung from the ceiling.

"Bingo!" Twil yelped. "And it's empty, perfect!" She reached over and slapped at a light switch next to the door frame, but the bulbs stayed dark. "Ahh shit, leccy's dead."

Raine spoke quickly. "Evee, drop the Fadestone's effect. Twil, shut that door and get it locked."

"Done," snapped Evelyn.

With her other hand finally free, Raine lifted me off my feet, princess carry style; the sudden pressure on the rear of my knee made me gasp and pant with a fresh wave of pain, but the weight off my injured leg was worth the trade.

Raine carried me over to the nearest bed and laid me down atop the sheets. My head fall back against the pillow, sinking into semi-conscious exhaustion, staring up at the dirty ceiling.

"Stay still. Don't try to move," Raine ordered. Then she left my dwindling field of vision.

Raine lifted my left ankle with a firm grip; I whined through my teeth. She eased the leg of my pajama bottoms up and over the makeshift dressing. Then she carefully peeled away the dressing itself, but the fabric was adhered to my skin with dried blood. I let out an involuntary scream, grabbing at the bedsheets.

“Shit!” Twil snapped. “We’re not fucking cloaked anymore, that racket is gonna bring someone running!”

“It— it hurts— I can’t— I can’t—”

Gentle hands offered me a folded corner of towel on which to bite down. Evelyn murmured something I couldn’t make out, but her words were soft and warm and full of aching sympathy. Her hand — her maimed hand — found mine and squeezed hard. I bit down into the folded piece of towel to muffle my next scream.

Raine worked as gently as she could. The fabric of the makeshift dressing finally peeled away.

Raine said nothing. Evelyn swallowed, loud and dry.

“Fuuuuuuuuuuck me,” Twil hissed. “She was running around on that not an hour ago! How did it get so bad so fast?”

I spat out my corner of towel and raised my head from the pillow, squinting down at my shin.

The wound looked horrible — a ragged double-line of split flesh either side of a deep incision filled with a trench of fresh, dark, ruby-red blood. The skin around the wound was inflamed, hot and aching; I thought I could see every pulse of my heart mirrored in the quiver of my flesh. The air reeked of blood and sweat and fear, but of something else also, a putrid, too-sweet, ammonia-like scent.

Infection. I started to gag and hyperventilate.

“Heather, lie back down,” Raine snapped, pressing a hand to my forehead.

“But— but—”

“We will deal with it. Lie back down. Now.”

“It— it’s infected! I can smell it in the air! I can smell it!”

My hands rose toward the wound in my leg, twitching with some mad desire to rip at my own flesh and dig out the infection. I bared my teeth, wishing they were sharp, my chest filling with the echo of some instinctive need to bite and tear at my own skin.

Raine grabbed my shoulders and pushed me to the bed, holding me down. Brown eyes like banked fires bored into mine.

“Stay,” she said.

I obeyed, head sinking into the pillow, breath coming in ragged gasps of animal panic.

I was no stranger to pain. I, who had grown the truth of my own body from scratch upon my flanks, from nothing more than pneuma-somatic suggestion and phantom limbs; I, who had endured internal bruising and bleeding and the repeated agony of bodily loss over and over again, all for the sake of euphoria and clarity and the shining rightness of Homo abyssus; I, who had plunged my hands and my mind directly into the dark and burning controls of reality more times than I could count. I knew pain like an old and difficult friend who never left. I should not have been so disabled by a mere cut on my leg.

But I was not whole. The Heather who had experienced those pains was sevenfold more than I was then, lying in a damp patch of cold and fearful sweat on an unfamiliar bed. I was but a sliver of myself, and I could not endure this.

“Wait, wait, hey,” Twil said, sniffing at the air. “Is she serious, is that infected? I think I can smell it too!”

“Yes,” Raine said. “She’s burning up. Fever, and it’s bad.”

“How?!” Twil spluttered. Her tail was tucked over her own belly, her wolf-ears gone flat and limp. “She was running around on it like an hour ago! I mean sure, she was a bit unsteady, but nothing like this! Infection doesn’t progress this quickly! What the fuck?!”

“It’s the dream,” Evelyn grunted.

“Eh? What does that have to do with Heather’s leg?”

Evelyn sighed. I couldn’t see her face, but I could hear the tension in her throat, the worry in her dry swallow.

“We changed the genre and tone of the dream,” she said. “We injected more horror — ha! Pun intended. Flushing that wound with water and wrapping it in torn-up bits of t-shirt is no longer viable. Heather needs proper medical treatment.” She paused. “Raine? What’s wrong now?”

I could only just about see Raine’s face in my peripheral vision. She no longer looked like my faithful hound, always grinning, wagging her own metaphorical tail as she awaited my orders. She was stony-faced and focused, staring at my leg.

“Raine?” I wheezed. “I-I’m scared, I’m really scared, I—”

Raine stood up and snapped off a string of orders. “Evee, you keep one hand on Heather, in case we need to use the Fadestone to hide. Twil, barricade the way in. Get one of those filing cabinets from behind the desk, drag it in front of the door. Now, please.”

As Raine spoke she unhooked the makeshift sling from over her shoulders — the loop of towel which contained Horror’s gagged head, Horror’s stolen heart, and Horror’s amputated arm — and dumped it on the next bed over.

“What?” Twil said. “That won’t keep anybody out for long. They’ll just bust the door down.”

“A barricade will buy us time to touch Evee so she can activate the Fadestone. Just do it.” Raine’s footsteps thumped on the bare floorboards as she strode away from the beds. I raised my head to see where she was going. She was walking to the far end of the room, talking to Twil. “Then get going through these medicine cabinets. We need antibiotics, disinfectant, maybe medical alcohol. Stitching thread and a needle, gauze, bandages, all that sort of stuff.”

“And what are you doing?” Twil said.

Raine went for the sink in the corner. “Washing my hands. With plenty of soap.”

Twil dragged a filing cabinet in front of the door to block any curious nurses, then flew to the cupboards and flung them open, rummaging through medical equipment, slapping needles and thread and packets of bandages down on the worktop.

“Raine, Raine!” she called out. “I don’t know what the hell I’m even looking for! There’s a ton of bottles, but—”

“Isopropyl alcohol, anything that says seventy percent or more. Iodine, or saline.” I couldn’t see Raine in the corner, but she was making a splashing noise in the sink. “Antibiotics too. Look for bottles that say mupirocin, neomycin, polymyxin, or bacitracin. Vancomycin too, but I doubt they’ll have that here. We also need painkillers. Look for codeine or hydrocodone. Morphine would be better. And a basin, for water. A glass too, we need her to drink. Scissors, don’t forget scissors. And gloves, we need gloves, for extra safety.”

Evee called out: “How the hell do you suddenly know all that, Raine?”

“I just do!” Raine called back.

Twil froze. I could see the top of her head, not moving, wolf-ears flat with anxiety.

Evelyn twisted around at my side. “Twil,” she said, firm and calm. “Take it slow. Do as Raine says.”

“ ... r-right, right. Okay. Cool. Right.”

Raine finished up washing her hands and joined Twil moments later. She started tossing bottles and packets onto the foot of the next bed over. Within a few minutes they had everything they needed.

Raine fed me antibiotics and painkillers; I couldn’t tell which was which, and I was beyond caring by that point. She helped me sit up long enough to swallow the pills with a glass of water, then had me lie back down again. The painkillers worked quickly, but not quickly enough. When Raine started washing my wound, I had to bite down into the folded corner of towel again, to keep from screaming my lungs out. The water hurt bad enough, but the disinfectant was worse. I whined and sobbed until my head was ringing with the pounding of my own blood. My left leg was a field of fire and acid. I squeezed my eyes shut and screamed and screamed and screamed.

“I’m sorry, sweet thing,” Raine murmured. “But we gotta.”

“Raine,” Evelyn said. Then again, harder. “Raine. Raine!”

“What?”

“We cannot do wound debridement on Heather’s shin. You understand? We don’t have the right chemicals or equipment, let alone the right kinds of painkillers.”

“It’s infected—”

“And you will be torturing her. Raine, this is a dream. You don’t need to be physically accurate. We’re not debriding that wound. Do you understand?”

Raine went silent; I didn’t comprehend what they were talking about, but then—

“Alright,” said Raine. “Twil, pass me the needle and thread.”

Twil swallowed. “Are you fucking sure you know how to do this shit?”

“We need to stitch this wound up.”

“Yeah, but, like, do you know how?”

“She does,” Evelyn grunted. “I’ve seen her do it before. And I wouldn’t let her do this to Heather unless I trusted she can do it right.” Evelyn turned back to me, her face filling the left side of my wavering vision. “Heather, you’re in safe hands. I promise. She does know what she’s doing, even if she’s acting funny.”

“Yeah,” Raine said. “I do know how to do this. I learned back in ... in ...”

Raine trailed off. I couldn’t see her face, but I could hear the sudden disjunction, the jarring slam of memory’s vault.

“... Raine?” Twil said. “Fuck me, you don’t look right.” Evelyn twisted around as well.

Raine took a deep breath. Amusement forced its way back into her voice: “Well, I don’t know where I learned to stitch up wounds. But I did learn. Guess the real me doesn’t want me to know, huh? Here, pass the needle. Quicker we do this the quicker Heather can get more antibiotics down her.”

To my relief and surprise, the sensation of having my skin punctured by a needle and threaded back together was barely painful at all, at least not compared with the deep-tissue ache of the wound itself and the waves of cold fire washing up through my hips. Raine worked quickly and precisely, though I didn’t watch; any time I threatened to raise my head and look, Evelyn gently reached over and tapped my chin or cheeks, making her point with excellent clarity.

I wasn't sure how long the stitches took; time seemed to stretch out to infinity as I lay on that bed, staring at the ceiling or at Evelyn's face. Evee didn't say much, though an awkward pressure lingered in her lips and around her eyes. I couldn't see more than the top and side of Raine's head, and Twil was beyond my limited sight completely. Sunlight wavered on the opposite wall, dancing as if scattered by a leafy canopy, then dimming and darkening until the room was plunged into a sudden midday gloom.

"You sure you can't get the lights on?" Raine said.

"Nah," Twil grunted. "There's only one switch and it doesn't do shit. Leccy's fucked, I reckon."

"Mm," Raine grunted, and bent back to her work.

When she was done, she snipped off the thread with a pair of scissors. I almost flinched as the shiny steel blades descended toward my aching flesh, but my trust in Raine kept me from jerking aside. The moment she cut the line, I felt a throb of strange release flow through my heart. Raine smeared some kind of oily gunk onto my shin, then packed sterile gauze over the wound site. She and Twil worked together to wrap my shin with bandages, walling up the wound behind clean white fabric. They fixed the bandage in place with a trio of safety pins.

Finally Raine stood up and stepped back, re-entering my field of vision, wiping sweat from her brow on the back of her arm.

Twil muttered, "We done? That's it?" Then she stood up as well, eyeing me with curious caution, as if I might cough up blood or go into convulsions at any moment. Her tail was tucked between her legs, but her wolf-ears stood tall. She and Raine both peeled off the disposable blue gloves they'd been wearing.

Three faces peered down at me. A fourth looked upward from within the crook of my arm — the Praem plushie was nestled against my ribs. Evelyn must have put her there to comfort me. I stared back into those blank eyes of stitched fabric in mute gratitude.

Twil said, "Is she, like, conscious, or what?"

"She's fine," Evelyn grunted. "She's hopped up on enough morphine pills to knock me out for a week, that's all."

Raine leaned closer, touching the back of her hand to my sweat-soaked forehead, then brushing my hair out of my face. "Heather? Heather, look at me. Concentrate, look at my eyes. Heather?"

"Mm," I croaked. "Raine. G—" I had to clear my throat, dry as a bone. "Good girl."

Raine did not smile. "How do you feel?"

"Bad."

Twil laughed. "Understatement of the year."

"Water, please." I croaked.

Raine fetched me a fresh glass of water from the sink and helped me sit up long enough to drink it all. I stared at my bandaged leg as I drank; the bandage was very clean and very white, without any bloodstains seeping through to mar the perfect surface. I knew next to nothing about proper wound treatment and care, but something about that bandage felt right, as if Raine had saved me in a way I didn't fully understand.

After I lay back down, the others all drank their fill as well. Everyone was tired and worn out, thirsty and a little hungry. Raine rummaged around in the canvas carrier bag and extracted the last of our looted food — some packets of crisps and random confectionery — then shared it out. She ate standing up. Twil sat on the next bed over, hunched forward, the sides of her open shirt hanging downward. Evelyn chewed slowly, staring at my bandaged leg in silent contemplation.

The whole infirmary was sunk deep in grey shadows; the only illumination came from the row of uncurtained windows between the beds, stained dim and dreary by the sudden cloud cover. The air smelled of antiseptic cream and harsh soap. The reek of infection was gone.

Twil stared out of a window, up at the 'sky', then sighed. "Weather doesn't know if it's coming or going."

Evelyn snorted. "It's the dream. How many times do I have to explain?"

"Eh? How'd you figure that? What do you mean?"

Evelyn sighed. "We were triumphant, so the sun came out. But now we're back down in the horror, quite literally. The weather has adjusted accordingly. Watch out if night starts to fall. That's when the real monsters come out, though we haven't seen one up close yet. Except for Raine. She killed one. Didn't you?"

Raine didn't answer.

Twil tutted. "I hate that shit. Bad stuff happens in full sunlight too, you know. Isn't this kinda like a bad cliché or something?"

"My fault," I croaked, little more than a whisper, staring at the ceiling, my head numb with opiate painkillers. "I like clichés. Stormy nights. Dark and spooky. Woooooooooooo. All that."

Twil laughed softly. "Wow. She really is drugged to the gills. You okay, Big H?"

"No," I croaked.

Raine still said nothing, munching through her bag of crisps without much expression on her face. She stared at me, as if thinking holes straight through me. I stared back, but she didn't even smile.

"Raine?" I croaked. She didn't respond. Perhaps my voice was too weak.

Evelyn said, "I hope there aren't any further shifts in tone and genre. You do realise that I haven't taken a piss the whole last two days?"

Twil blinked several times, then blushed faintly. "E-Evee? What are you—"

"Don't make it weird, Twil," she snapped. "It just occurred to me, after drinking that water. I haven't needed to use the toilet since Heather woke me up, which must be near twenty four hours now. I still don't need to. Whatever patterns the dream is following, our realistic bodily functions are not part of it. Pray that hasn't just changed, or one of you is going to have to lift me out of this chair so I can take a shit."

"No problem," Twil said. "Whatever you need."

Evelyn snorted. "As if. I'm being rhetorical."

Twil chewed on her tongue, then shrugged. "I guess Heather doesn't exactly play a lot of survival games?"

Evelyn reached over and patted my arm with sudden affection. “Yes, we should be thankful she doesn’t have a Minecraft addiction.”

“I have no idea what you’re talking about,” I croaked. “It’s all very esoteric.”

“Good,” Evelyn said, surprisingly gentle. “Let’s keep it that way, for now. You just rest, Heather. Stop trying to think.”

“No thinky,” I murmured. My eyelids were so heavy. “Head empty.”

The room lapsed into silence. Cloud shadows drifted across the peeling paint of the walls and the undressed bare floorboards, brushing Raine’s naked, filthy feet. Twil let out a series of long sighs, rubbing her eyes and running her hands through her hair, then poking at her recently acquired wolf-ears. Evelyn leaned to one side to peer at the Praem plushie, then shrugged and left her where she was, tucked into the crook of my arm. Tiny sounds filtered through from the rest of the hospital building — snapping footsteps, muffled voices, the gentle ticking and banging of old radiator pipes.

And Raine just stared at me, unsmiling, so very still. Something was wrong with her, I could tell that much, but I was too high on painkillers to put it into words.

“Soooooooooooo,” Twil said eventually. “What now? We gonna just rest up here for a bit? What’s our next move?”

I shook my head — well, I rolled it back and forth against the pillow. “We have to get to Zheng,” I croaked. “We can’t wait. Have to free her next.”

“No,” Raine said, so gentle and soft, too soft, like a predatory big cat rising from repose. “You have to rest, Heather.”

“I just need a— a— a lemon or two,” I said, trying to sit up. Evee put out one hand to encourage me to remain lying down, but I pushed past her and levered myself upright, supporting myself on my hands. My head throbbed with a rush of blood; my vision swirled, then cleared. I stared down at the bandage around my left leg. “A lemon, right. Or a ... fish and chips? Or a bottle of soy sauce. I could just drink it neat—”

“I can head out and try to secure some more food,” Raine said, still not smiling. "But you're not going anywhere."

Screwing up my eyes did not help the fuzzy feeling inside my head, nor slow the throb of dull pain still radiating upward from my leg, but it did allow me to gather my thoughts. I opened my eyes again and squinted at Raine.

She was staring back, eyes propped just slightly too wide, no smile upon her lips.

I said: "Raine, we have to go get Zheng. Me and you, together—"

"No, you have to rest," Raine said.

I shook my head. "That doesn't matter. This isn't real, it's all a dream. The sooner we wake Zheng—"

"You're stuffed with painkillers and you cannot walk on that leg," Raine said. "You won't even be able to get there."

"Then carry me!" I snapped. "Carry me on your back and—"

"You need to rest."

Twil stood up and held out both hands. "Woah, woah, you two, fucking hell. I've never heard you argue like this before. Big H, you are hopped all the way up on a big fat dose of morphine. So chill, 'kay?"

Raine said: "That's exactly what I was—"

"And you," Twil said, rounding on her. "You are acting freaky as fuck. Snap out of this robot mode or whatever it is. You're giving me the heebie-jeebies, Raine."

Raine turned her expressionless stare on Twil. "Am I?"

"Fuck!" Twil snapped. Her tail curled straight upward, standing along with her wolfish ears. She bared her teeth and flexed her fingers like claws. A growl rose in her throat. "Stop it!"

"Stop what?" said Raine.

"Heather," Twil said between gritted teeth. "You gotta tell your girlfriend to stop acting like this or I'm gonna lose my shit."

"I ... I don't know what she's doing," I said slowly. My skin broke out with a fresh wave of cold sweat. "I've never seen her like this before. Raine? Raine, what's wrong? Raine, you've been a very good girl. I don't understand what's wrong."

Raine turned back to me and broke into a grin — wide and sharp and manic, a burning light behind her eyes. I flinched; there was my Raine, but raw and unfiltered, like her confidence and charm was a switch she had flicked.

"Sorry, sweet thing," she purred. "Didn't mean to freak you out. Nothing's wrong. I just don't want you to burst all those stitches we just did."

Twil and I exchanged a worried glance. Twil swallowed. I tried not to shake and shiver. "Uh ... R-Raine, are you feeling okay?"

"Never better. Now you're safe."

Evelyn cleared her throat. "She's regressing."

Raine turned her worryingly tight grin on Evee instead. Evelyn did not flinch or balk or turn pale, she just sighed and rolled her eyes.

"Toward what, my darkling lady?" Raine asked.

"Uh, yeah," Twil echoed. "What do you mean, regressing to what?"

"It's hard to explain," Evelyn said, voice tight, holding Raine's manic gaze. "Regressing further toward how she used to be, how she was long before she met either of you."

"Evee," I croaked. "Didn't you say Raine is already acting like when you first met her?"

Evelyn spoke slowly, measuring each word. "Partially. Since I woke up, she's been rougher, yes, but not all the way there. She's been acting similar to how she did when we were teenagers, that's correct. But this ... this is more like Raine at our actual first meeting. The first few days or weeks. She's regressing toward that. I think. I can't be certain."

"And what was she like?" I said. "Back then?"

"Feral."

Twil snorted. "She's pretty damn fucking feral already! You mean this gets worse? Why the fuck is she acting like this?"

"I don't know," Evelyn said, low and tight. "Perhaps because we adjusted the nature and tone of the dream. Or perhaps because Heather got wounded and needed real treatment. Remember, Raine is technically not awake, not like the three of us. She's still dreaming. She's just dreaming usefully."

Raine chuckled. "I feel wide awake, my darlings."

"This doesn't change that we need to go help Zheng," I said.

Raine's gaze flickered back to me. Her smile vanished. She pointed a finger. "No. You're hurt. You lie right there and rest—"

"Raine, please—"

"You lie there," Raine repeated. "And rest."

"... Raine, are you ... ?"

Raine blinked rapidly. She was shaking, as if poised on the verge of screaming rage or wild weeping. Her grin jumped back onto her face, splitting her mouth wide, then flickered off again. She blinked more and looked away, swallowing hard.

Twil said: "Is she waking up? Yo, Raine? You waking up?"

"I don't think so," Evelyn grunted. "I think she's stuck."

"Raine?" I said gently. "Raine, what's wrong? Try to put it into words? Please, for me. Be a good girl, for me, please?"

Raine's lips started to move, but her muttering was so quiet that it did not reach my ears. She shook her head gently, then hard, jerking it from side to side. A whisper scratched at her throat. The room fell silent as her voice rose.

"Can't let you get hurt. Can't let you get hurt. Can't let you get hurt," she kept saying, over and over. "Can't let you get—"

Raine cut off all of a sudden and walked over to the sink in the corner. She grabbed one of the glasses we'd been using, filled it with cold water, and dumped the contents over her own head. She set the glass back down with a clack and just stood there, water dripping off her face and sticking her hair to her scalp. Then she wiped her eyes and mouth with her hands and walked back to the foot of the bed. She swept her hair back and rubbed her damp face on her arms.

Then she smiled at me, almost back to normal. "I'll go."

“ ... Raine?”

“Fucking hell,” Evelyn hissed. “She may have been waking up, in fact, and she just bloody well suppressed it! Raine, for fuck’s sake!”

Raine smiled wider and held out both hands. “It’s cool. Heather’s correct, we can’t delay because of her leg wound. We need to be on point and ready for Lozzie’s next riot. But Heather can’t walk, not yet. I might be able to carry her, but that’s too risky with the heightened security. So I’ll go alone. I’ll take the meat to Zheng myself, make sure she eats it all, and do what I can to free her.”

“Uh, um.” I hesitated. “Raine, I really think it has to be both of us. Zheng and you have a special relationship, and she loves me too. She probably needs both of us to—”

Raine held up a gentle hand. “That’s not possible right now. This is the next best option. And you’re right, sweet thing, we have to keep moving.”

“Raine, it has to be like it was in reality! That’s the only way this makes sense.”

Evelyn broke in: “Actually I think this is already a little bit too much like reality.”

“Ah?”

Evelyn clicked her fingers to catch my attention. I met her eyes and found her looking rather unimpressed. “Self-sacrifice,” she grunted. “You’re always so bloody terrible about that, Heather. And now you’re trying to do it again. You promised, so many times, no more of this. If you keep pushing, there’s no telling what that stubborn impulse might do to the dream. No needless self-sacrifice.”

“You ... you think it’s right to let Raine do this alone?” I asked. “She’s all messed up!”

“And she’s right,” Evelyn grunted, then sighed. “She’s the only one who can go do this alone. You or I can’t make it up there. Twil isn’t as stealthy, so she needs to stay and protect us.” Twil muttered a gently offended little ‘hey’, but Eevee ignored it. “It only makes sense, Heather. Raine and Zheng, they have their ... thing, together, so she should try this. She’s right.”

Raine stared at me, waiting for an answer. Her eyes began to tighten, her smile slipping into that too-sharp, too-wide, manic grin once again, the feral look creeping over her as she regressed toward something she did not wish to be anymore.

“You can’t do everything alone,” Raine said. “This is your dream, but we’re all in it too, right? You don’t do everything alone. Can’t do everything alone. Can’t let you lose that leg to gangrene or infection. You gotta rest. You gotta take care of yourself. Gotta let somebody else shoulder the burden.”

Twil sighed. “She’s got a point, Big H, even though this is pretty weird. This ain’t just all about you. Let her try for Zheng, hey? What harm can it do?”

I swallowed and nodded. “All right. All right then. I don’t like it, but okay, Raine. I’ll rest. You take the meat to Zheng.”

Raine nodded, then leaned forward, cupped the back of my skull, and kissed my forehead. Then, despite the presence of Evelyn and Twil, she kissed me on the lips too, hard and fleeting.

“Love you, sweet thing.”

“I love you too,” I said. “Good ... good girl.”

Raine prepared for her solo mission. I told her the location of Zheng’s residential room as best I could, hoping that the logic of the dream would guide her feet. She took her machete and slung the towel full of body parts over her shoulders again. But then she paused and removed Horror’s towel-wrapped head. She placed it on the next bed over from mine, upright, gagged and bound and sealed up.

Twil wrinkled her nose in disgust. “She’s staying with us?”

Raine nodded, straightening up and stretching her limbs one by one to limber up her muscles. “Gotta travel as light as I can. Sneaking missions by daylight are a lot harder. I can deal with a nurse or two, but one scream or one runner would bring the whole place down on me, so I gotta do this without being seen. Light and fast, in and out, quick as I can.” She nodded at the towel-wrapped ball on the bed. “Plus she might try to mess with me. Nah, she’s gotta stay here. Leave her wrapped up, yeah?”

Twil snorted. “Nah, I thought I’d play footy with her. Course we’re gonna leave her wrapped up, shit!”

“You be careful, Raine,” Evelyn snapped. “We lose you now, we’re behind again. Don't you screw up."

"Same to you three," Raine said. She nodded at us as she stepped away from the beds. "Keep the Fadestone ready to go, stay close to each other. Twil, you shove that filing cabinet back into position as soon as I'm gone. I'll move as fast as I can. If the meat doesn't work, I'll try to pick Zheng up and carry her back here. Sounds good?"

"Sounds good," I croaked. "Take care, Raine."

She shot me a wink and a final grin. "I will, sweet thing. You rest that leg. Love you."

"What if you don't make it back?" Evelyn asked. "If we make it through the night here and you haven't returned, we'll have to keep going. Heather's right about that."

Raine winked for her too. "Carry on without me for a bit. I'll find you again. Ain't no cell on earth can hold me for long."

"We aren't on earth," Evelyn grunted.

"Exactly."

Twil followed Raine over to the door and prepared to pull the filing cabinet aside. Just before she did, Raine reached out and grabbed the loose collar of Twil's open shirt, pulling her around so they were face to face.

Twil spluttered. "H-hey, yo, Raine, what—"

"I am trusting you to look after these two," Raine said, stony-faced, back behind her unsmiling mask.

"Yeah, yeah, of course I will, what are you—"

Raine shook her head. "That means you listen out. You stay alert. You don't charge into a fight. You stay here, you stay with them. If you have to sleep here, you stand watch. If the worst happens, you fight so they can hide. Understand?"

Twil stopped struggling and looked Raine right in the eyes. "Course I do. That's two of my best friends over there." Twil's eyes flickered to Evelyn. "And maybe something else, too."

Raine smiled, all warm again, suddenly switched back on. "Good. Let's go, wolfie. Lock the door behind me."

Filing cabinet squeaked aside; door lock opened with a soft click. The door itself swung just wide enough for a single furtive exit. Raine paused to check left and right, then she was gone, padding off down the corridor at speed, racing away from our hidden refuge.

All I could think was that we'd done this before, back in the locker room. Raine would not stay lucky forever.

Twil got the door locked and barricaded again, then walked back over to the bed. She looked a little sheepish, tail tucked low, ears flat.

"So, uh, what now?" she asked.

Evelyn sighed and glanced at me. "Heather, for pity's sake, lie the hell back down."

I did as I was told, sinking back into the bed.

The three of us — four, if one counted Praem tucked into the crook of my arm — took Raine's sagely advice and stayed close together, well within arm's reach, lest a sudden assault by nurses or Knights seek to breach the barred door. Evelyn stayed right beside me, huddled down in her wheelchair, Fadestone in one hand, the other hand free to reach up and touch me at a moment's notice. Twil grabbed the chair from behind the single desk and joined us, knee-to-knee with Evelyn. Twil did what she could to make me comfortable; she pulled the sides of my yellow blanket around my front and tucked me in, to keep me warm, to cover my bandaged leg with the physical manifestation of Sevens' affection.

"I shouldn't be here," I croaked. "I should be helping. Should be helping. This is the dream, trying to slow me down. I was so stupid, shouldn't have gotten hurt ... "

"You got that wound saving me," said Evelyn. "Was that worth the pain?"

"... what?"

"Was saving me worth the pain?"

"... of course. Of course."

"Well, there you go then," she said as if that was the end of the subject. "You've already helped. Now try to relax. In four hours you can have a second dose of morphine, but not before."

For a long time I drifted on the edge of consciousness, floating on the cushion of opiates in my blood, kept from true sleep by the insistent throbbing pain in my shin. I stared up at the ceiling, watching the dirty white surface darken toward dusk. Twil and Evelyn carried on a whispered conversation at my bedside, but I only caught snatches of their words, dipping in and out of the oblivious haze of slumber.

“—you still look great, you know? Even if you’re all messed up by this bullshit dream or whatever, you look—”

“Oh do shut up, Twil. I look like a mummified frog and I know it.”

“You look beautiful.”

“ ... ”

“You always look beautiful.”

“Shut up. And this is not the time.”

...

“—dream is based on Heather’s experiences at Cygnet Hospital, when she was little. That much is blindingly obvious, but it’s also the Eye, at the same time, like two metaphors intertwined with each other. This whole place is a mess, I can’t even begin to pick it apart. We need a shrink who is also a mage.”

“And what about her over there?”

“Who?”

“Horror, in her towel. You buy Heather’s theory that she’s part of the Eye too?”

“Somewhat. But she’s more Heather’s fears than the Eye’s ego or whatever. I’m very worried by the fact she’s still alive and talking, even if she is just a head.”

“Ah? But she’s harmless. Unless she goes all body horror on us, like you said.”

“Yes, yes, but what if she really does represent Heather’s trauma? What does that tell us?”

“ ... ah. Oh shit. Yeah, like, that’s bad.”

“Indeed.”

...

“—wish we knew where the Cattys were. Can you imagine them busting through all this? I’d ride one into battle, no shit, that would be the coolest thing ever.”

“If wishes were fishes, et cetera, et cetera. I don’t actually recall how that saying goes, but you get the point.”

“Did you just say ‘et cetera’ out loud?”

“I did. What of it?”

“ ... ”

“What, Twil?”

“You’re so fucking cute.”

A sigh. “I don’t appreciate these attempts to flirt—”

“We’re in like, life-or-death peril, right? When else am I going to flirt with you? Come on.”

“Twil—”

“It’s not like I’m trying to bang you. Heather’s out cold right here. There’s a disembodied head over there. We’re in some real Scooby Doo surrounds. Not exactly sexy time. But hey, if you—”

“Miss Twilight Hopton.”

“Oof! Come on, Eevee, don’t call me that, that’s worse than ‘Twillamina’.”

“Really?”

“Well, no, it’s actually much funnier. But still.”

A short silence, broken by audible smiles.

“I do ... I do ... love you, Twil.” A huff, the loudest sound I’d heard so far. “But you and I are so incompatible it’s not even funny.”

“We don’t have to be like girlfriend and girlfriend or anything.”

“No, I suppose we don’t.”

“ ... would you like that, though? Going steady, nice and stable, all that?”

A shrug, heard in the clicking and grinding of the bones in Evelyn's shoulders and back.

Twil again: "What do you think of me, really? Come on, no filter. Just say it."

"I already told you, don't make me repeat it. Or are you pretending not to have heard?"

"Nah, nah. Not like, how you feel about me. What do you think of me? Come on, Saye." A grin crossed Twil's words. "Hit me as hard as you can."

Evelyn leaned forward in her chair — I could hear the seat of the wheelchair creaking — and hissed, low and sharp with a teasing grin in her voice that I'd never heard from her before, a side of Evelyn that was not mine to see, but which only Twil could draw out.

"You're hot shit and you know it," Evelyn whispered. "I want to put a collar around your neck and force your head between my thighs with a yank on your leash, but I'm afraid you'll bite."

Another creak — Evelyn leaning back.

Twil swallowed, dry and tight, then cleared her throat. "Uh ... o-okay."

"You did ask."

"I did, but ... okay then."

...

After that, I finally drifted too deep beyond the wall of sleep. If Twil and Evelyn flirted further, I did not hear them. I heard only the throb of blood in my own ears, backed by the ticking and tingling of pain deep down in my left shin, ebbing down and down and down, into the darkness of my tender healing flesh.

When I awoke into a dream within the dream, the pain was gone.

The infirmary had fallen into evening shadows, deep and heavy, clustered up in the corners of the dirty ceiling. I lay on my back, on the bed, staring upward at those shadows, wishing they would descend to lull me back to true sleep. A gentle scratching sound whispered at the edge of my hearing, punctuated by little tick-tap-tick-tap noises, in between the scratchy motion of chalk on a board.

I knew I must be dreaming, because the pain was gone. Surely I was overdue for my next dose of morphine. Nothing seemed to matter very much. All emotion, all worry, all concerns had fled. I was dreaming. Dreams were safe.

But curiosity lingered. What was that sound, the scratching and the tapping?

I turned my head on the pillow. Evelyn and Twil had fallen asleep in their respective chairs, holding hands. Evelyn looked like a comfy little sprite, tucked up inside her grey dressing gown. Twil's head had nodded onto her chest. She'd finally buttoned up her shirt again. Perhaps she was cold. The door was still barricaded. Raine had not yet returned.

A tall figure stood behind the desk, facing away from me.

She had long blonde hair, hanging down over the back of a white laboratory coat. A towel-wrapped bundle hung from her left hand — Horror's head. Her right hand worked with chalk upon a blackboard, which had not been present in the waking world. She had covered half the board in a single long equation, sprawling forth from a particularly difficult knot of numbers in the top left of the blackboard. She was still writing, still adding figures to the mathematics, scratching and clicking with a stick of raw white chalk.

The Governor of Cygnet Asylum had come to visit.

"Hello?" I croaked.

The Governor's hand paused. Her head twitched, but she did not turn to look.

"Crutch," she said. "Next to your bed."

I started to sit up; somebody had helpfully propped a plastic and metal crutch against the side of my bed, so I would be able to walk on my wounded leg. As I sat up, I almost knocked an object out of the crook of my arm — the Praem plushie!

I caught Praem before I could so rudely knock her to the floor, then cradled her in both hands, smiling down at her funny flat eyes and the straight line of her mouth, dim and dark in the evening shadows. I finished sitting up and swung my legs over the side of the bed, ready to reach for my new-found crutch.

Praem stared; I stared back. Her flat eyes insisted that I pay attention.

Pay attention, Heather.

Lucidity returned, rushing into my head as the adrenaline rushed into my veins. My left shin throbbed with renewed pain. I swallowed a gasp, because I really did need that second dose of morphine.

Scratch-tick-tap-scratch-tick-tap; the Governor returned to her equation, writing upon the board in clean white chalk.

This was no dream.

bedlam boundary – 24.23

Scratch-tick-tap-scratch-tick-tap.

The Governor's stick of chalk flicked and dragged across the blackboard, a stuttering white spark in the gathering gloom of an early evening, cradled in the spider-clutch fingers of a dusken hand, palm and wrist melding into the softly squirming shadows. Tendrils of shade lapped at her messy mane of dark blonde hair, as if trying to straighten out the tumbled tresses. Red-orange light filtered through thickly cloying cloud cover beyond the windows; the last glint of a ruddy sunset snagged on the metal angles of the dozen wristwatches she wore on her right forearm, framed by the rolled-up cuff of her laboratory coat. The night crept upward to swallow the swinging globe dangling from her other hand — Horror's severed head, wrapped tight in a towel.

Scratch-tick-tap-scratch-tick-tap.

The infirmary was choked with umbral tide; evening was dead, falling gracefully into the grave of night. Through the uncurtained windows, the grounds of Cygnet Hospital lay beneath crests and peaks of flowing darkness, crowned by the thinnest remnant of the sun's falsehood.

No sound reached out from the rest of the asylum, as if all the patients were sleeping in their beds and all the staff had gone home for the day, or retreated to their night-time posts, or simply vanished with the passing of the light. Even Evelyn and Twil were perfectly quiet in their premature slumber, though I could see their chests rising and falling with soundless breath.

All was silent and still. All, except that unceasing skitter-scatter — scratch-tick-tap-scratch-tick-tap.

Adrenaline drowned my brain and flooded my nervous system. Breathing was almost impossible. My skin broke out in cold sweat, sticking hair to scalp and clothes to flesh. I clutched the Praem Plushie in clammy palms, wide-eyed at the Governor's back, at her bold shoulders beneath her lab coat, at her tumble of dark hair, at the swish and flick and jerk of her hand as she drew chalk across board.

How was this possible? The door was still barred by a filing cabinet, a big metal monster which only Twil could move with ease. Why had Twil and Eevee not awoken? The scratching and tipping and tapping, it was so loud! The sound jabbed at the inside of my skull, prickling my eyes with tears, provoking the edge of a sneeze.

And what was she — the Governor, the Eye, the Eye's embodied ego? — what was she doing?

Mathematics, of course.

She was writing out an equation.

Panic surged up from my guts in a wave of nausea and vertigo; the sneeze was strangled by the taste of bile in the back of my throat. The Governor had spoken to me, hadn't she? And now she was performing hyperdimensional mathematics, and only the horrors of Outside knew what nightmares would flower from those numbers and—

Praem — a plush Praem, held in my sweaty, trembling hands — bid me to take a deep breath and stay calm.

I nodded. I took that deep breath. Panic ebbed back down my throat, though it still burned in my chest.

"Evee," I whispered as loudly as I dared. "Evee? Evee, wake up. Wake up! Evee? Evelyn?"

Evelyn slept on; perhaps she could not hear my voice over the scratch-tick-tap-scratch-tick-tap of the chalk. I reached out and did something I would never normally contemplate, — I grabbed Evee's shoulder without warning or permission, hard and rough and careless enough to hurt. I shook her. I squeezed. I dug with my fingertips until I found collarbone and scapula. I even used Praem, pressing the plushie to Evee's shoulder.

But still she did not wake.

"... Twil? Twil, wake up! I need help. Twil!"

I had to lean further to reach Twil in the same manner. She was no more responsive than Evee. They both slept on, holding hands, breathing in slow silence.

Alone. Alone with the Eye. Alone to face—

No! Praem insisted.

I dragged my eyes downward to meet those flat discs of stitched white, going grey in the thickening shadows of the night. She was right here. Praem, who was in many ways as much my spiritual daughter as she was Evelyn's. Praem was right there with me. I need not face fear alone.

But face fear I must, or else the Governor would complete her equation without me.

"... stop," I croaked, raising my voice. Louder. "Stop. Stop writing. Wait for me. Stop! Please!"

Scratch-tick-tap-scratch-tick-tap. The Governor kept writing.

A plastic and metal crutch stood propped against the side of my bed; the Governor had put it there, so that I might walk on my injured leg. That was a good sign, I told myself. It meant she wanted me to get up and go over there and join her. She was not simply performing brain-math upon us, without knowledge or consent. I was expected to participate in this process, whatever it was.

My throat closed up. My hands shook all the harder.

A lesson.

The Eye wished me to join her for a lesson. We had gone without one for almost a year, had we not? And finally she had me where she wanted, back in a nightmare, back in the classroom, back with the mathematics once again.

I could not let her dictate the pace. I had to intervene.

I slipped my left arm through the supporting loop of the crutch and gripped the textured plastic handle in a sweaty fist. With my right arm, I hugged Praem to my chest, safe and secure. Then I levered myself to my feet, took one unsteady step, and—

A hundred tiny knives ripped open the flesh of my left shin.

The bandage was clean and unblemished. The dressing was intact. No blood leaked through Raine's loving and delicate stitch-work. But the pain choked me on my own gasp, blinded me with tears, and made me want to vomit. The sole of my foot could not endure the slightest pressure. I could not walk, even with the crutch.

Scratch-tick-tap-scratch-tick-tap; the Governor's equation now filled a full quarter of the blackboard.

"Stop ... " I whined. "Please, stop."

If I tried to cross the room — a dozen steps? More? — the pain would knock me out or drive me mad.

A row of pill bottles stood on the counter top, amid the peeling white paint and the dubious dark stains, about to be swept into the clutch of the crawling shadows. The counter was only three or four paces from the foot of the bed. I could make that. I forced three deep breaths down my throat, then clenched my jaw until my teeth squeaked. Raine and Evelyn and Twil had bought me time and clarity. Praem supported my other arm. I could make it! Three or four steps was nothing. I could make it, I could!

Never before had I held Evelyn in such reverent respect as upon the eternity of pain I spent crossing the width of that infirmary.

Evee always made it look so easy, walking on one mechanical prosthetic and one withered leg — which could barely hold her weight — swinging her walking stick like an extension of her body. Evelyn strode, strutted, stomped, and stamped with style and substance. But me? I sweated and shook and slipped, hauling myself along on that shivering crutch, my good leg almost buckling underneath my meagre body weight, swallowing a scream when I was forced to put pressure on the sole of my injured leg.

I reached the counter top and slumped against the wrinkled wood, panting for breath, sweat running down my face, sticking my pajama top to my back. The pain was creeping higher now, fresh barbed wire forcing its way up through my veins and arteries to tear at the meat of my thigh and chip away at my hipbone.

Painkillers — codeine, hydrocodone. Pill bottles jangled and echoed, shoved aside. Not enough, not for this pain.

The bottle of morphine threatened to slip from my sweaty hands. I gripped harder, scrabbling at the lid with my fingernails. Broke the white plastic, let it clatter to the counter top. Couldn't read the tiny text on the bottle, blurred by tears and shadow. Had four hours passed since the first dose? Would I poison myself with opiates if I took more right away? How many tablets, how many should I swallow, how many—

Praem assured me that more than four hours had elapsed. She instructed me to swallow two pills.

My juddering hands extracted four pills instead; I let two fall onto the counter and roll away, too desperate and distracted to pluck them up and return them to the bottle. I shoved the little disks into my mouth, dry and hard and small. A glass stood at my elbow, holding less than a mouthful of lukewarm water. I tossed it down anyway, then swallowed. The pills scratched and stuck as they went. I almost choked, coughing and spluttering.

But down the morphine went.

The painkillers hit my stomach like honey drowning a fire. I stood for too long, gripping the counter top, swaying suddenly, my vision eaten away by the darkness at the edges.

Praem guided me to a bottle of antibiotics. I needed my second dose, lest the first be wasted. The pills were chalky chewable circles. They tasted like lemons.

Praem told me to slip both bottles into my yellow blanket. I might need them later.

Scratch-tick-tap-scratch-tick-tap.

The Governor's flicking stick of ghost-white chalk had reached the halfway point of the blackboard. The equation glowed in the shadows, the letters and numbers and spiral-shape figures rising in phantom phosphorescence out of the falling night. Her blonde hair swayed as she wrote, dragging across the laboratory coat. The last of the sunlight was almost gone.

"Stop," I croaked again. "Stop writing. Please, just wait for me."

Somewhere in the back of my mind I knew that oral opiate tablets should take thirty minutes or more to start functioning, to wash away the pain and the care, to leave me able to walk without screaming and blacking out. But I did not have thirty minutes. I did not have even three.

I put Praem down on the counter top — "Just for a second, I promise, I promise, won't leave you here" — then fumbled with the cuff of my left-hand sleeve. I pulled back the ribbed brown jumper, then the soft pink pajama top with the strawberry pattern. The Fractal shone on my skin, darker than any shadow. Stark black lines and perfect angles, pure and uncorrupted by the touch of the dream.

Praem returned to the crook of my right arm; I hugged her tight, to my chest. I gripped the crutch once again, angling my body weight so I could stagger forward.

Morphine dripped downward, leeching into my wound, pushing back the pain.

Off I went, striding into the dark, toward the Governor's back and the ceaseless flickering of her chalk, trying not to scream as I put weight on my left foot. Where were my slippers? Raine must have removed them before she'd carried me to the infirmary bed. Ah, there they were, fallen by the door. Too far for the additional steps. Too far to divert. To swing that way would break my momentum and send me crashing to the floor. My poor feet would have to remain cold for now. A little chill hardly mattered.

I lurched like a drunkard upon the deck of a sailing ship, lost in the worst of all storms. I slammed into the desk, hissing and grunting, using the impact to re-route my own balance. Then I staggered sideways, reeling forward, and fell against the wall, next to the edge of the blackboard.

Scratch-tick-tap-scratch-tick-tap. The Governor kept writing.

"Stop," I croaked. "Stop. Stop writing. Stop. Stop!"

Scratch-tick-tap-scratch-tick-tap.

I righted myself and stood on both feet, despite the grasping claws of pain inching upward. I extracted my left arm from the crutch and thrust it forward, pointing the Fractal at the Governor.

"Stop!"

Scratch-tick—

She stopped writing.

The Governor paused, a wavering shadow outlined by the glass of the window, a high nose and powerful cheekbones framed by a mane of darkest blonde. Her spine was very straight beneath her laboratory coat; her chest showed a swell of coffee-coloured jumper, a perfect match with my own. Her face, free of even the tiniest blemishes, without even a single mole, was blank and bored. Eyes pink as blood-frothed water glowed faint as if with distant inner light.

My mouth was bone. My hands were frightened doves. My heart hammered against Praem's fabric-and-stuffing body.

"What are you doing?" I said.

She circled a portion of the equation with a loop of chalk. Then her arm hinged outward, offering me the shining white cylinder.

I started to shake my head, but then I took her seriously; I straightened up as best I could, taking my own weight on legs and crutch, tugging my yellow blanket tight across my shoulders. I examined the equation, but I could not make head nor tail of what it was meant to mean. It spilled across the blackboard in ghostly figures, thousands of them packed shoulder to shoulder. The numbers and symbols meant nothing.

"I'm not any good at mathematics," I said. The words felt absurd, but they seemed the right thing to say. "Not without the rest of me. Only one seventh of me is here right now. You must know that."

The Governor gestured vaguely with the stick of chalk, encouraging me to take it from her.

"I can't," I said, voice tight with new-found fury. "It doesn't mean anything to me. I don't understand. I never understood why you did this to me. I mean, yes, I have working theories now — you were trying to propagate yourself, spread yourself, make a copy of yourself, find a mirror into which you could look and see yourself. Or it was all a mistake, because we were just cuckoos in your nest, yes, fine. I know all that. But I still don't understand."

The Governor gestured with the chalk again, slow and easy.

"Look at me," I hissed.

The Governor turned her head — slowly, haltingly, dragging her eyes across the equation as if her gaze caught upon the figures. She stared for a moment at the number seven, then a three, then at a symbol I did not recognise. She stared at the darkness beyond the blackboard, pausing upon the wall, then on the filing cabinet which blocked the door.

Finally her eyes met mine. She did not withdraw the stick of chalk.

“Take it?” she said.

Raine had been correct; the Governor spoke with a distinct Reading accent, my accent. Her voice was floaty and soft, like the wind through a field of drying cloth. We did not look alike, the Governor and I. Her face was bold and sharp where mine was round and soft. Her skin was dusken dark where mine was pale and pasty. She was taller than me by more than a head. Her hair was thick and luxuriant. Her eyes were empty and elsewhere.

Only our accents matched — and the jumpers we both wore, brown as cream-rich coffee.

“I can’t do anything with it,” I said. “I was never able to refuse you before. In the dreams, the nightmares, the decade of nightmares. I could never say no. But now I can tell you no, can’t I? Because you have ears, like this. So no, I won’t take the chalk.”

She blinked. Twice. Looked away. Then back at me again.

“It’s yours,” she mumbled. “Take it?”

Praem suggested this was a good idea. If the Eye — or the Governor — did not have the chalk, then she could not return to the equation. At the very least, we would be more in control of the situation. Good idea, Praem. I reached out with trembling fingers and plucked the ghostly white stick from the Governor’s grasp. Our hands did not touch. The idea of touching her flesh made my skin crawl.

She watched me take the chalk. She had no reaction, neither good nor bad.

As I took the chalk, I noticed something.

“Your watches have all stopped,” I said. None of the dozen watches on her right arm were ticking. All their hands had ground to a halt.

She withdrew her arm and glanced at her watches, moving her gaze from wrist to elbow, as if struggling to rake her attention across the petrified faces. Her eyes flickered away again, losing interest. Then, back to me.

Eyes the colour of crushed brick and powdered shell. Rain-clouds at dusk, swallowing a dead sun. The rim of morning. Pink like entrails, flower-buds before the storm.

I shook my head, bewildered and numb, unsure what to say. What can one possibly say, to the avatar of a nightmare which has haunted one's dreams for half of one's life? My mouth felt dry and my leg ached, but most of my fear had fled. Why was I unafraid? Because this metaphor for my decade of nightmares was nothing compared to the reality. The Governor was nothing compared to the Eye. The Governor was so passive.

But she was the Eye, in the same way that I was Heather.

"Are you lucid?" I said eventually. "Do you know what you are?"

The Governor shrugged, eyes wandering away. "I know I can't leave."

"I've never spoken to you before," I said. "Not really. You and I, we don't speak. You can't speak. You just communicate in ... well, in this." I gestured at the inscrutable mathematics on the blackboard, the glowing letters thrusting outward from the night's skin. "Is that what you're trying to do? Are you trying to speak with me?"

The Governor blinked. "I don't have time for this."

"Time for what? Time doesn't matter, this is a dream, time will bend to accommodate whatever we do. I've rendered you down into a human shape. Or at least part of you. You can just use your mouth. You can talk. Talk to me. Tell me ... why."

She shrugged.

"I never wanted your lessons," I said, a strange cold anger dying inside my chest. "I never wanted any of it. I wanted to be a normal person, an ordinary person, and live with my sister. But you, you took all that away and shoved this shit into my head and ... and ..."

"A shuddering breath went through me. "And if you hadn't, I never would have met Raine, or Eevee, or became what I am now. I don't understand how I should feel about you. Should I feel anything at all?"

The Governor watched this truncated outburst without expression.

I sighed. "Why am I even saying this to you? You don't care."

"You need to finish the equation", she said.

"Why? What does it do? What's it for?"

"It's for you."

"I just told you, I don't want your lessons. I cut you off a year ago, because I don't want them anymore. You see this?" I gestured with my left arm, raising the Fractal. "This is a restraining order. No more of you."

"I know."

"All I want is my sister back. All I want is Maisie."

The Governor blinked, brow crinkling — with incomprehension. Did she not understand?

The Governor looked away from me, dragging her eyes across the equation once again. Then she looked out of the window, then up at the sky — no, at the ceiling, blank and covered with a clustering of shadows. But it was the sky at which she gazed.

"How can I be both above and below?" she asked. "How can we be more than one? We've always been just one."

Praem prompted me with something I would not have considered — empathy.

"... are you lonely?" I asked.

The Governor lowered her gaze and looked at me. "I need to see myself."

I shook my head. "I am not your mirror."

The Governor shook her head too. "Not what I meant."

"You can't see yourself in a reflection," I said. "That's just the physical self. If you want to see yourself — your real self — reflected, then you need context. Other people. Community." I sighed and squeezed my eyes shut. "What am I even saying? Why am I saying any of this to you? You're ... you can't comprehend any of this. Can you?"

"We are both trapped, are we not?"

I opened my eyes to find the Governor staring back at me, still without expression.

"Have you been watching us?" I asked. "Me and my friends? Have you been watching what we're up to, following our progress? Do you understand why we help each other, why we want to help each other? Is any of it getting through to you? Is this play reaching you?”

The Governor looked back at the equation. “I don’t have time for this. You need to finish the equation.”

I almost laughed. “I can’t! I’m reduced. I’m one seventh of myself. And it’s your institution which has done this to me, to all of us. This place is the inside of you.”

She glanced out of the window again. “Not my intention.”

“Where are the other six of me?” I demanded, not expecting an answer.

“Restrained. Captive. Boxed up.”

“ ... in the ‘Box’?”

“Mm,” she grunted.

Hope surged in my chest. “And Maisie is in the Box, too?”

“Mhmm.”

“How can I get into the Box?”

She shrugged. “Through a door, I suppose.” Her gaze wandered back to the equation again. “Are you going to finish this?”

I sighed. “I keep telling you, I can’t. I don’t understand any of the mathematics. I need you to teach me, all over again. Is that why you’re here?”

The Governor looked at me — suddenly, sharply, her pink-frothed eyes clearing of haze and distraction.

Lucid, the Governor saw me.

I almost stumbled back, clutching my metal crutch, crushing Praem to my chest in quivering fear.

“I’m here because you understand,” she said. “Because you and I understand each other. We are the same thing. We seek the same thing.”

I snorted — a weak little laugh, a feeble defence. “You’re a god and I’m your angel. Is that it?”

“You are my daughter,” she said.

I sighed, the fear ebbing away. “No, I’m not. I have an actual biological mother, who gave birth to me. You just ... adopted me. Against my will. By force. I mean, you kidnapped me. Me and Maisie. Why did you never let her go? You have to understand ... ” I trailed off and swallowed, surprised by the bile rising up my throat. I had not prepared for this, for a face-to-face chat with the thing which had kept my twin sister imprisoned beyond reality for ten long years. “You have to understand how angry I am with you. With what you’ve done. Keeping her and I separated, keeping her here. I ... I don’t even think you understand the concepts, but I could easily hate you for that.”

“Do you hate me?”

I was lost for words. What was hate, to something like this? She didn’t care. Hate was irrelevant. “No,” I said. “Because there’s no point.”

The Governor’s gaze wandered away again, over the equation. She shrugged.

“I need to return to the archives and finish my work.” she muttered. “Then I will see.”

“ ... pardon?”

She shrugged again. I’d heard her perfectly, but I didn’t understand.

“What are the archives?” I asked.

“Everything,” she muttered. “Every detail. All which needs to be seen.”

“And what does that mean? What do you need to do in the archives?”

“All I need to do is finish going through the archives. Once I’ve finished, everything will make sense. Once I understand, everything will make sense.” The Governor turned away from the equation, back to me again. “Are you going to finish this?”

I glanced at the numbers one last time, chalk pinched between my fingers. I asked Praem if she knew how to do this — she had opened the door to Wilson Stout’s office, hadn’t she? But Praem said she could not. This was true hyperdimensional mathematics, irrelevant to any maid.

"I can't," I said eventually. "I keep telling you, I can't."

The Governor nodded. She slid her hands into the pockets of her lab coat with the finality of putting on a hat and scarf.

"Wait!" I snapped. "You're in charge of this place, Cygnet Hospital, the asylum. You are the authority, you're in charge. If you want me to finish this equation, or you want to finish whatever you're doing in the archives, then let us go."

The Governor looked at me without expression, pink eyes glowing faintly in the dark.

"Let us go," I repeated. "Dismiss all the staff, all the doctors and nurses. Throw open the cells, the prison, the high-security wing, all of it. Let us go before the next riot. Because if you don't, the riot will grow, the revolution will win. We'll sweep the staff aside and knock the walls down, either metaphorically or literally. And then we'll halt your work with the archive. It'll never be completed, whatever it is. We will halt your work."

The Governor stared at me, and said: "I would like that very much."

Then she stepped around me, heading for the barred door.

"Don't just leave!" I snapped. "Let us go! Or at least explain what the archive is! Hey!"

She crossed to the door; it was no longer barred. The filing cabinet stood aside. The door itself opened, yawning on the near-to-night darkness of the corridor beyond.

"I could show you," she muttered. "I'm going back. You can come, if you want."

"I ... I can barely walk!" I said. "My leg is killing me, and that's with a fresh dose of morphine."

The Governor paused in the doorway and looked back at me, then down at my leg. "Mine too. Same spot."

"... pardon?"

"We're the same. I told you, we're the same. We understand each other. You should look at the archives too. Maybe you can help. Maybe you were supposed to help all along. That would be pleasant. I would be ... less ... singular ... "

The Governor trailed off, turning toward the darkness. She stepped out into the corridor and turned left, heavy boots slapping on the floor as she strode away.

“Wait!” I snapped. “Wait for me, you— dammit!”

I stuffed the stick of chalk into my yellow blanket and hobbled over to my mud-befouled slippers. Getting them onto my feet was not easy, even now the morphine had soaked into my bones; putting too much pressure on my left leg sent a strange echo of pain upward from my shin and into my thigh and hip, like the sound of a bowling ball rolling slowly from wall to wall down an empty hallway. It didn’t actually hurt, but seemed as if it should, like biting one’s lip after having a dental anaesthetic. My body was calm and easy, but my mind knew that I would pay in pain later on.

With my slippers jammed onto my feet, I staggered toward the open door, swaying on my crutch like a ship with a broken mast. The Governor’s footsteps were vanishing toward the edge of my hearing.

In the doorway I paused and lifted the Praem Plushie to my face. We looked back together, toward where Evelyn and Twil slept on, oblivious to our departure.

“Should I follow her?” I hissed, asking Praem her advice. “This isn’t safe, I know this isn’t safe!”

I was addled by opiates and half-sunk in dream logic, but I was not stupid — venturing out, alone, into the darkness, on the heels of the Eye itself, barely able to walk, was by far the most stupid thing I could possibly do in this situation. I should slam the door shut and lock it fast, then try to drag the filing cabinet to re-create the barricade. But this was my chance to find out what the Eye really wanted. She would lead me straight to this ‘archive’, if only I could follow.

But was I stepping into a trap?

Praem said yes. Obviously. This was unsafe. Do not attempt to follow the Governor. Close the door and stay—

“Heather?”

The Governor’s voice floated down the hallway outside. Her footsteps had stopped.

Perhaps she had decided to give me a proper answer. I checked with Praem. Praem said it was okay to look, but don't follow. Don't follow. Don't leave everyone else behind.

I lurched out into the corridor.

To my right was darkness, dingy walls, and dirty floor. To my left, twenty feet or more down the hallway, a single yellow light bulb guttered above an intersection, casting sickly grey light across the corners of painted plaster.

The white hem of the Governor's laboratory coat flicked around one of those corners.

"Wait!" I hissed into the darkness. My voice returned as a chorus of echoes — wait wait wait wait ... "Where are you going?! I'm not going to follow you! Come back! Talk to me, you—"

The light bulb in the intersection guttered out.

Darkness was absolute. For a split-second I could not even see Praem's fabric face, tucked into the crook of my arm. I hiccuped; the sound was flat, without echoes, as if I was buried in a box.

Then the light bulb burst back to life, like a dying body gasping for one more breath.

The door to the infirmary was gone, replaced by a whitewashed plaster wall. The junction ahead had vanished; the corridor had straightened out — and out and out and out, stretching off into infinity. A corridor of infinite length, punctuated by occasional flickering light bulbs between an infinity of nothing. The Governor stood beneath the first such struggling bulb, facing toward me, hands thrust deep into the pockets of her laboratory coat. Her pink-froth eyes seemed to look past my shoulder, as if penetrating the shadows to my rear.

"Don't dawdle," she muttered.

She turned on one heel and walked away, boots clicking against the cold floor, stepping out of the light and into the darkness, as if her feet created the reality beneath her soles.

"Oh," I hissed. "Oh, oh no." I glanced back down at Praem. "I'm sorry. I'm so sorry, Praem. I've left Evee behind. I'm so sorry. This is my fault, I take responsibility, it's my fault, I shouldn't have stepped beyond the door. I'm such a fool, I—"

Praem told me not to worry. This wasn't my fault. I cannot have been expected to know the Governor would have authority over the physical walls and portals of Cygnet Asylum. That was just cheating.

But I should have expected anything; this was a nightmare, after all.

"We can get back to the infirmary, we can," I whispered to Praem. "I'm not doing what the Eye — the Governor, whatever she is — wants me to do, and right now she obviously wants me to follow her, she—"

Praem directed my eyes to the corridor ahead and impressed upon me that I did not have a choice. At my rear stood a wall of darkness. The corridor ahead was a straight line, unbroken by branches or junctions, punctuated by that weak light struggling against the night beyond the walls. The Governor was receding into the distance, laboratory coat flapping about her calves. Soon she would leave me behind, alone in the dark.

No path existed save on the heels of the Governor.

"I'll get us out of this," I hissed, then swallowed a hiccup. "I promise I will. Hold on tight, Praem."

I swung my crutch forward and lurched off in pursuit, driven by anger and outrage as much as fear or curiosity. The Governor — the Eye, I reminded myself with a grunt and a snarl of effort, as I caught my body weight and hauled myself onward, crutch-tip squeaking against the floor — had lured me away from my friends, away from those who mattered, and then trapped me with a dirty trick as soon as I was separated from those who helped define what I truly was.

"Wait for me, you ... you ... horrible thing!" I hissed at her retreating back.

The lights flickered at the sound of my voice. I cared not. Morphine pushed back the fear.

My lurching stagger ate up the corridor; my head spun with sudden vertigo, but I crammed my eyes shut and carried on. Within thirty seconds I caught up to the Governor's clicking heels. The sober part of my mind knew that was impossible, but Praem suggested I not consider that fact too closely. We walked between pools of flickering electric light, oases of weak and watery illumination separated by oceans of darkness. In the gloom between the lights, nothing seemed to exist except her and I, and the sound of our feet.

“Where are you leading me?” I demanded.

“Where you asked to go,” said the Governor. “To the archives.”

“And what are the archives? What do they archive?”

“Everything,” she muttered, voice drifting away on the empty black air. “All of it.”

“Everything what?!” I spat, wishing she would pause for a moment so I could smash her in the ankles with my crutch. “All of what? What is in the archives, all of what?”

“Observations.”

And as she spoke that truth, the lights guttered out, plunging us into the abyss.

When they flickered back on, we were no longer walking down a corridor of infinite length, vanishing toward a point miles distant. That had just been a filthy lie to get me out of that room, to peel me away from my friends, away from my protection and my context. Now the Eye and I were walking down an ordinary hospital corridor, walls punctuated by doorways and junctions. A stairwell loomed ahead, climbing toward flickering bulbs.

Now is your chance, Praem reminded me. Get away from her as soon as you can.

Right, I agreed. Absolutely! Time to slip away and get back to the infirmary. Time to leave!

Yet the institution itself denied my escape with great and intentional efficiency; as we passed the open mouths of empty corridors and plodded up winding staircases, every route but the one ahead was choked by darkness. The Governor strode on past lightless junctions and the gaping holes of many doorways. Each was filled with black, the walls and floor vanishing into lightless immensity within a foot or two. I had no torch or mobile phone, no way to pierce the darkness except my own opiate-fogged vision. I wished for my tentacles, my other six selves, strobing as bright rainbows from my flanks; together we would have made a mockery of the darkness, turned it into a playground, no obstacle at all.

But I did not have any of that. I was one, alone, singular, and I could not see in the dark.

I hobbled on at the Governor's heels, hoping always that the next corridor, the next junction, or the next stairwell would provide an alternative route, a flickering light bulb in the distance, a hint of a way out. I waited for an exit.

I waited in vain. Every corridor was impassable with darkness, all but the one we already trod. The Governor walked on, click-click-click, heading always for the next island of electric illumination, the next set of flickering light bulbs in the ceiling, the next buzzing fluorescent bar attached to a hospital wall. We passed banks of windows blinded by the night outdoors, the last rays of sunlight finally swallowed up by the horizon of the Eye. We hurried on through gaping hallways that seemed to open into nothing on either side, as if we walked on a tightrope above an abyss. We trod past row after row of closed doors, the little windows looking in on the unlit cells of patient residential rooms. Nothing and nobody stirred within.

Twice I almost stepped from the path, willing to brave the dark just to avoid whatever deeper trap the Eye was leading me into. But both times I halted, then scurried back toward the Governor's heels, for I saw shapes moving in the deep darkness beyond sight — inhuman outlines, warped and twisted, wrapped in scraps of nurse-like uniform.

The staff of Cygnet Hospital still stalked the night-time corridors.

Raine might be able to outfight or outrun a nurse, but I was unarmed and disabled. If I left the Governor's side, I would not make it back to my friends. What an irritating and insulting irony.

After several long minutes of walking — of staggering and lurching and clutching at my crutch — I drew level with the Governor, to walk beside her rather than at her heels. I glanced up at her eyes, but she simply stared straight ahead as she walked. Pink glow burned deep behind her irises.

"May I ask you a question?" I said. "Will you answer?"

"Of course. That is the first principle of teaching."

I clenched my teeth, but I did not waste my breath on a rebuke. "Where are the archives?"

“Below my office,” she said. “Beneath.”

“And where is your office?”

“You’ve been there before. You should remember that.”

“Humour me. Pretend I don’t know. Just tell me where it is.”

“We’re going there right now.”

“Tell me where it is.”

“You should memorise the route.”

Praem reminded me that there was no point in losing my temper. This was a dream, and the Eye was not the Eye, merely an avatar, an expression, a small piece of a whole. The Governor was an idiot god at the centre of the institution, concerned with only one thing — the archives

And myself, I supposed; she was taking an interest in me. She was taking me to the archives, but wished me to know nothing else but that which she was going to place in front of my eyes.

The Governor led me deeper and deeper into the core of the hospital. We seemed to move into administrative areas, carpeted and whitewashed, with doors that opened on lightless offices and bookkeeping rooms, with a hint of desks and shelves pinned behind the wall of night. The stretches of darkness between the electric lights grew longer and longer, with light bulbs flickering at the far ends of elongated corridors, so that we trod across vast expanses of twilight emptiness between pools of reality.

And the staff — the nurses — began to surround us.

The misshapen figures never entered the pools of light, nor came close enough for the overspill of clean yellow illumination to reveal the truth of their features. They gathered in the mouths of empty corridors and lurked around the door frames of abandoned offices. Each one wore a clean white nurse’s uniform — the only element of each figure which caught the distant, dim illumination they so steadfastly avoided. But each uniform was stretched and warped in new directions. They came in all varieties, details hidden in the shadows: lumpy, humpbacked, bulging with ropes of muscle; writhing, tentacled, wet and moist and dripping in the darkness; stick-thin and jerking, quivering and shivering faster than sight could follow. Their faces were worse, concealed by the gloom; some had their features jumbled into a chaotic mess, while others wore their expressions upside down, with eyes on the bottom and mouth up top. Many nurses had no face at all, merely a flat expanse of featureless flesh, or sagging folds of wrinkled grey, or trunks of drooping matter that looped downward to connect with a handleless wrist or a shrunken belly. They carried restraints, straitjackets, plastic cuffs, and brimming syringes, all cradled in quivering, jerking, twitching hands of too many fingers with too many joints.

Here was the truth beneath the human face of the asylum, pressing in from all sides, revealed by the paradoxical darkness.

The Governor's presence kept them at bay. Or perhaps that was Praem's work, cradled in the crook of my arm, trying her best to protect me from harm.

"What ... " I tried to whisper, but found my mouth had turned to dust. I hiccuped, painfully. "What do they ... "

The nurses stepped out behind us as we passed through the darkness, pressing thick to our rear, filling the corridor with a mob of flesh and uniform. The Governor was leading me toward a final distant light — a thick yellow bar glowing above the frame of a plain double-door, casting clean warm welcome in a semi-circle beneath the portal. The door was open by just a crack.

How could I tell this was the final light? Dream logic, morphine, and madness.

"What do they want?" I hissed, not expecting an answer. "The nurses. What do they want?"

"To make you better," the Governor said. "To heal you."

"I don't believe that for a second," I whispered, trying to swallow, my throat closing up. "They're a metaphor for part of you, part of what you want. Aren't they? Yes, fine, they're built from my own memory of medical treatment, but you can't seriously expect me to believe this is—"

"I have no jurisdiction over the night shift." The Governor glanced down at me, pink eyes glowing faintly in the darkness. "Night is your time."

"... what? You're saying I'm doing this? But I—"

A nurse stepped out in front of us.

Human once, perhaps still so by daylight, the figure's form was like melted candle wax stained with sewer water — mottled grey and green, sagging here, pinched there, the whole thing listing to one side as if weighed down by the mass of a bloated leg or over-large arm. She cradled a set of syringes in her hands, their fragile glass filled with noxious green fluid. She had no face, just a series of holes in a soupy grey surface.

Her name tag was illegible in the darkness.

The Governor stepped around the nurse without breaking her stride, but I stumbled to a halt and almost fell, catching myself on my crutch and my bad leg. A stab-pulse of pain jagged up my thigh like a bolt of pale lightning, overcoming the morphine in my blood. A gasp caught in my throat, spittle running down my chin. I grabbed Praem in my right hand and held her out like a talisman, to ward off evil spirits.

The nurse reached for me with one misshapen hand, fingers like burst sausages — but then she paused. Praem held her back.

The Governor strode on.

“W-wait!” I croaked. I lurched to the side and hauled myself around the nurse, hurrying to catch up with the Governor. The nurse turned as I circled her, watching me with those empty holes in what could not be a face.

Panting for breath, I rejoined the Governor. She did not spare me a glance as she walked on.

“I am not doing this to myself!” I snapped. “This is a metaphor for you, you’re doing this. Call them off!”

“I have no jurisdiction over the night shift,” she repeated.

“You’re in charge!”

“I’m afraid of the dark.”

I was shocked speechless. I almost halted. “What? Why? What difference does the dark make to something like you?”

“Can’t see in the dark.”

I blinked several times, stunned by the simplicity. No observations could be made in the dark, if one could not see. To a being that was all observation all the time, darkness must be like ceasing to exist.

But I'd always enjoyed the dark, the shadows, the comfortable gloom where one could rest at ease.

Perhaps we were not alike after all.

I glanced around at the nurses who filled the doorways and corridors we passed. Were they on my side, in some metaphysical sense I could not yet comprehend? I gave the question serious consideration, then decided no, that was impossible and ridiculous. The nurses represented everything I hated. They were intruders, infesting the natural calm of the darkness I enjoyed. They should not be here. The institution would not be so bad if only they were gone, if only they would—

This time a trio of nurses staggered into our path.

I lurched to a halt, swallowing a scream.

The Governor stopped, then quickly turned herself sideways and slid between two of the nurses, popping free on the opposite side. Three more nurses moved in to fill the gaps through which she had fled. She turned back and looked at me, pink eyes glowing over the faceless heads and hanging trunks and mangled masses of flesh that could not be called faces.

"You have trapped yourself," she said.

"I'm not doing this to myself!" I almost screamed, holding Praem up in one hand. "Tell them to move!"

"They're not mine," she said.

Behind me, more nurses were gathering, shuffling and dragging and swaying forward out of the darkness. They filled the sides of the corridor, blocking me off both in front and behind. A wall of stretched and broken white uniforms barred my way, filled with inhuman masses and dripping sores and twitching bundles of unidentifiable limbs. All flesh seemed to meld into the darkness, becoming one with the gloom, both emerging from it and merging into it at the same time.

"Get away from me!" I shouted, waving Praem as if she was a lit torch and the nurses would recoil from her fire.

They stayed back, but they did not retreat. I was trapped by a ring of staff, by the many mouths and hands and avatars of the institution.

“Are you not coming?” said the Governor.

“I can’t! I can’t push through this, they’ll— they’ll capture me, I— I don’t even want to touch them, I won’t touch them, they can’t make me, can’t make me do anything, anything, anything—”

The Governor raised a towel-wrapped bundle, dangling from her left hand.

Horror’s head. Had she been carrying it this whole time? I could not recall. I could only remember her hands being thrust into her pockets. How could she have carried Horror all this way, without my notice?

With a gentle underarm throw, the Governor tossed the towel-wrapped head into the scrum of nurses.

For a moment of reeling confusion I thought she was somehow trying to help me, trying to scatter the nurses like pins before a bowling ball. But the misshapen, twisted, flesh-beast creatures neither parted nor recoiled. They writhed as if they were a single organism, some occulted orifice accepting the bolus of Horror’s severed head.

A shudder passed through the crowd. Shoulders shrugged and heads moved aside. Arms rose, lifting an unwrapped package.

“No,” I hissed. “No, no no no no!”

Horror — A.HORROR — stared down at me, held aloft by a dozen nurses, with her loose blonde hair spilling from the sides of her decapitated head. She alone remained unchanged, the pretty face atop the ugliness of the institution.

She smiled, broad and bright. The hands leaned forward, as if the nurses’ arms had become a substitute for her neck.

“You’re dead!” I screamed up at her. “You’re dead! We killed you! And your boss is standing right there! Aren’t you supposed to be afraid of her?!”

Horror smiled.

“Oh, I wouldn’t worry about that, Heather,” she said, voice scratchy and raw, crusted by dried blood blocking her throat. “She can’t see in the dark.”

bedlam boundary – 24.24

A beheaded Horror leered and loomed above the sea of darkness, beheld aloft on a neck of dream-bewitched arms as if atop an archipelago of wan and wasted islands, her bedraggled hair a halo of burnt and broken blonde like ashes on the ocean; beyond Horror's dozen-doubled back, the Governor merely watched. Pink eyes stared impassive and uncaring, empty hands sunk deep in lab-coat pockets. She would not rise or rouse to take my side. And behind her, far away across the empty black of void and death and illimitable dissolution, a semi-circle of weak yellow light glowed above an unremarkable and unimportant double-door — the final island in a sinking chain, the final resting place of reality.

But that refuge lay too far distant, when even one step forward would be too much to take. To my own rear, another island of light stood beneath a bulb, blocked by a wall of nurses and their uniforms wrapped around false flesh. And then that light flickered out, the island sinking beneath the sable iron waves of the dream.

I stood beleaguered and besieged, by nurses and night, by the abyss of the mind, by nightmare madness from my own past.

Even I could see that much; one did not need to be a giant eyeball to figure it out.

"Patients are not allowed to wander the halls at night," Horror crooned — a clotted voice of crackly blood, dried to crust in her dead throat. "It's irresponsible of us to allow it. You could get yourself hurt! Or lost. Or get up to all sorts of mischief. Now, Heather, you must come with us, back to your room. You can't expect us to allow you to flout the rules like this. Rules apply to everybody."

The nurses shuffled forward, one organism of grey flesh and sagging meat, spread across dozens of bodies. The institution, embodied.

"No!" I screamed, waving Praem's plush prison before me like a cross at a crowd of vampires. "Stay away from me! Stay away, all of you!"

My left shin sang with a muffled chorus of pain pinned beneath morphine. Sweat both hot and cold broke out all over my skin, screaming for fight or flight, though I knew I could achieve neither. The wall of nurses had become a ring, pressing inward on all sides, blocking me both in front and behind, contracting and constricting. I staggered on the unsteady support of my crutch, lurching around so I could wave the Praem plushie at the nurses to my rear.

“Now now, Heather—”

“Don’t touch me! Don’t touch me!” I screamed.

The nurses slowed their shuffle. Praem held them back.

Horror — held high on her neck of nurse’s arms — let out a long-suffering sigh, followed by the tut of a woman who wanted to go home for the night after a hard day at work. I twisted around again and almost lost my footing, catching myself with a squeak of my crutch against the invisible floor of darkness.

“Heather, Heather, Heather,” Horror huffed. The arms which held her aloft shook her head from side to side. “You shouldn’t make demands which you cannot back up with action. It’s a very bad habit, you know that? If you can’t ever enforce your words, people stop believing them. You should really think more carefully before you speak. I thought you loved books and literature, this is the sort of thing you should know.”

“W-what?” I croaked. “What are you talking about?”

“Don’t touch you?” Horror echoed my own words, raising her eyebrows. “Don’t touch you — or what, Heather? What are you going to do? Are you going to bite and scratch? We have methods of dealing with that. Are you going to struggle and spit? We have ways of handling that too. Are you planning to hurt yourself? Well, that can all be explained away.” Horror smiled, her lips a slash of lightless crimson in the suffocating shadows. “Heather, I am holding back out of respect for our history together, not because you can compel me to do anything. That is not how this relationship works. I am the nurse. I compel you, the patient, to do as I say. And if you cannot be compelled with words, then you will be compelled with force.” She smiled again, almost sad. “All for your own good, of course.”

I sucked breath down my throat, trying to clear my head, trying to ignore the meaning of Horror’s words and see past the symbols upon the surface of the dream. Had the Eye led me into a trap, or was the Governor telling the truth — was this all me, doing this to myself? Was this night shift my doing, my own pain and trauma inflicted back upon my own brain, a reflection of my own history, and nothing more?

But my breath came in jagged gasps. Fear had seized my heart. A panic attack was clawing up from my guts. And the nurses were shuffling closer still.

I had to fight, which in a dream meant I had to think, but—

Praem told me to take a deep breath. Count the inhalation. Hold the oxygen (in a dream? Doesn't matter, just do it.) Count the exhalation.

Horror's scabbed-up voice interrupted my purging breath: "You must come of your own will, Heather," she said. "It is so much better for you if you engage with the process. Healing is quicker and easier if you allow it to happen, if you would only—"

"Did you lead me into this trap?" I shouted — past Horror, past the heads of the nurses, past the darkness, speaking to the scrap of glowing pink eye standing tall in the dark.

The Governor blinked, but did not answer.

Horror tutted — a dry and papery rustling. Flakes of blood floated from her lips; they vanished when they touched the darkness beneath our feet. She leaned forward, neck of arms holding her further out, looming toward me.

"You cannot go over my head on this matter, Heather!" she snapped. "You think the administration, the Governor, the Director, all of those types, you think they have any stake or say in the day-to-day running of a hospital? No, of course they don't! They exist to keep the institution running, yes, but they're not really the brain or the heart. The nurses and doctors, the real staff, we are the—"

"Just answer me!" I snapped, ignoring Horror completely. "I need a serious answer, just yes or no. Did you lead me into this?"

The Governor shrugged. "Night's yours."

"Heather!" Horror shouted in my face, only a foot or two away now. I raised Praem and Horror's head recoiled, but not by far. She ranted on. "You need to accept the healing process, Heather! And that means not engaging with these fantasies of meaning. This delusion that you will find answers in constructed worlds, in fantasies from inside your own mind. You must engage with reality! With reality!”

Fear curdled and boiled. “Reality!?” I screamed up at her. “In reality I would rip you all apart with my tentacles! This isn’t real! You’re a metaphor for something and I wish I could just—”

Deny you.

Realisation was a tingle in my brain, a tickle down my back, a flowering in my guts.

Horror went on: “Your sister is exactly where she should be. You need to accept—”

“You’re the denial,” I said, slowly and carefully. “You’re all of it — the denial, the diagnoses, the hospital, the trauma. You’re the bit of me that thinks I can’t free her, or I never deserved to, or that she was never real in the first place. Or the part of me which sometimes wishes I could slink off and die quietly, and pretend none of this ever happened, that the entire last year of my life was a lie.”

“Heather, this is—”

But she could not interrupt. “You’re right,” I said. “You are a nurse — you’re all the nurses and doctors I ever knew, even the kind ones, the compassionate ones, who really were trying to help. Because they did damage too. You’re the ten years of making me want to give up, leave Maisie behind, and surrender to the process. You’re the piece of me which wishes the diagnosis was real, so reality wouldn’t be so scary and complicated. You’re ... you’re everything I hate about myself, everything I fear I could give into, everything I would have given into if Raine and I had not met by pure chance.” I took a great shuddering breath; it felt like vomiting, like purging my guts of poison. “I mean, yes, you’re also a metaphor for the carceral structure of the Eye and what it’s done to Maisie. But firstly you’re all my fears. Aren’t you?”

Horror smiled, slow and sharp in the strengthening dark.

“Oh Heather,” she purred. “I’m just a nurse. And it’s past time you went back to your room.”

The wall of twisted nurses shuffled forward, stomping and slipping, tripping and tapping, stumbling and bumping — and reaching for me with a hundred misshapen and swollen hands, pointing dozens of darkly glistening syringe tips toward my exposed flesh, brandishing their manacles and their zip-ties, their straitjackets and their handcuffs, a wave to drown me beneath the weight of the institution, no matter the cold clarity of inner revelation.

This time they did not recoil from Praem, though I waved her like a torch. One nurse clutched at Praem's stuffed body, greasy claws closing about her velvet head. I screamed and yanked Praem back, fearing more than anything to be rendered finally alone; I crushed Praem tight to my chest, hugging her close, protecting her instead. She had no suggestions, only a return of my embrace, a soft apology, and a declaration that she would not allow them to hurt me.

A mad impulse bid me to wave my crutch instead — anything to keep the nurses back, to protect myself and Praem.

But the moment the tip left the floor, my left leg buckled.

I went down with a yelp, fell with a snarl, and landed with a breathless whine. I hit the ground with a crack of bone on solid concrete, though the floor was nothing but darkness. Pain shot through my left knee and into my hips in a jagged web, breath ripping down into my lungs, eyes fogged with tears. The world and my body became a blazing rod of pain.

My legs and backside began to sink, as if the darkness was turning to quicksand beneath my weight. The lightness and warmth of Sevens' yellow blanket struggled against the sucking mire, but the buoyancy was not enough. The fabric began to soak through with rich black darkness.

The nurses closed in, tightening their ring, reaching down toward me with a hundred grasping hands. Syringes angled toward my neck. Scrabbling fingers closed around my right arm and pried at my grip, trying to take Praem away. Strings of frozen drool landed in my hair, sticky slick like old mucus. Feelers grabbed my ankles, squeezing at my bones. A bulging sack of distended meat brushed the back of my head. Horror watched from the apex of the closing circle, a mask of sorrow written upon her features, as if sad that our inner conflict had come to this. If I would not surrender, then she would grind me to nothing.

“Just relax, Heather,” she said. “We’ll take you back where you belong.”

A hand of knobbly knuckles and fingers like garden wire found my throat and squeezed. “H-help—” I croaked, not able even to cry.

A sigh rolled through the nurses, like a gust of wind through the leaves of a dead forest. They almost paused.

The Governor said: “You need to finish what you started.”

The hand about my throat tightened quick and hard. My pulse slammed upward through my neck; pin-pricks of syringes touched my flesh. Cuffs and manacles fumbled about my wrists; straitjacket fabric pressed to my back. The edges of my vision throbbed red, then faded black.

I wheezed. “What ... ”

“You still have the chalk,” the Governor said. “It’s yours.”

With the last of my fading strength I pulled my left hand from the sucking mire of the floor; droplets of oil-like darkness clung to my fingers and palm, falling like rain back into the dark below. Nurses clutched for my wrist and forearm — but they recoiled from the Fractal, fingers twitching and jerking as if struck by electric shock. I stuck my hand into my yellow blanket. My sight dimmed to nothing, choked to the edge of the dream.

My fingers crushed the certainty of chalk. I gripped hard, and drew it forth.

The nurses recoiled, reeling backward, staggering away. Fingers left my throat. Syringes retreated. Straitjackets fell to the floor.

The world came rushing back; breath slammed into my lungs like a back draft of superheated oxygen. I heaved and wheezed, coughing and spluttering, strings of drool hanging from my slack lips. My eyes were full of tears and my face burned like fever. The pain in my leg was a living thing, stirring in sleepless dreams, and I prayed it would stay in slumber.

For minutes I sagged and spluttered, hiccuping more than once. Praem nestled close in my right arm. My left held salvation aloft.

Vision cleared, fog of tears peeling back. Breath slowed, calming to the pump of my heart. Praem suggested I raise my eyes and take a look, which seemed sensible enough.

The stick of chalk glowed in the dark.

Just as it had for the Governor, the chalk was lit with cold fire amid the infinite shadows. The nurses — Horror included — could not endure the pale shine of the chalk. They had retreated from me, but only by a few steps. The chalk-light was cold and weak, clean and white, with none of the yellow warmth of the electric bulbs or fluorescent bars.

“... oh-okay,” I panted, throat still raw from being strangled to the border of unconsciousness. “Okay. Okay. I-I think I get it.”

“This is unwise!” Horror snapped. Her eyes were half-squinted against the glow of the chalk. “Heather, it was never meant for you! Put it down! Put it down and—”

“Shut up!” I shouted at her. “I wasn’t asking you!”

The Governor’s voice floated upward, trapped beyond the wall of nurses. “You need to finish what you started.”

“But what does that mean?!” I waved the stick of chalk. “Everything here is metaphor, fine. Then what does this represent? The ability to perform hyperdimensional mathematics? The capacity for self-examination? The acceptance of my own body? What!?”

“Just write,” the Governor said. “The rest will come to you.”

I felt like rolling my eyes and keening with frustration, but Praem suggested that I take the Governor seriously. Praem reminded me with gentle firmness that I did not have much choice. I was still trapped by a ring of nurses. I had no other way out but forward.

“Write on what ... ” I muttered.

Praem made the obvious suggestion: the floor, of course.

Good girls did not scribble on the hospital floors, but I shed that objection with less than a shrug. I had not been a good girl in rather a long time; on the contrary, I had learned how to be very bad indeed.

The tip of the chalk clacked against the darkness itself, forcing the floor into solidity.

With no idea what to write, I simply scrawled on the ground — numbers, figures, mathematical symbols, all jumbled up one after the other, spiralling off around my collapsed legs and my aching knee. The symbols glowed like phosphorescent paint.

The nurses recoiled further, stumbling backward.

But the writing — or what I was writing — hurt. An all-too-familiar tingle grew behind my eyeballs, blossoming into a stabbing headache pain of twin lances into my skull. A roiling spot of queasy unease in my guts spread and spread and spread, until I swayed with nausea, bile clawing up my throat.

Brain-math, without the aid and cushion of six extra minds, without the power input of my bioreactor.

And I had no idea what exactly I was writing; the numbers and symbols spilled out from within me, appearing as if my hand was possessed, like automatic writing. As soon as I started to think about that, as soon as I focused on it, as soon as I questioned, I could no longer continue. I faltered, stalling, choking on the promise of vomit.

The letters started to fade, islands sinking back into the benighted floor.

The nurses pressed inward once again.

“It was always falsehood, Heather,” Horror said. “Just delusion. The product of an unwell mind. Nothing more. And delusion can only prop you up for so long.”

“Shut up!” I screamed at her, then tried to catch a glimpse of the Governor past the advancing wall of nurses. “I—I don’t know what to write! I keep running out of numbers! I can’t do brain-math anymore, how am I supposed to know what to write!?”

“It’ll come naturally,” she said. “It’ll come.”

“It bloody well isn’t!”

The Governor fell silent.

I scrabbled on as best I could, snorting back the need to vomit, blinking hard against the growing headache pain, pausing between each number and symbol, worried that they were all wrong, that I was writing the wrong thing, performing the wrong equation. I couldn’t write fast enough, the numbers vanishing in turn, catching up with my desperate shaking hands, glow fading to nothing. The nurses stumbled closer, raising their arms to shield their eyes from the light, reaching for me once again with hands like bags of walnuts and tendrils dripping with sticky mucus and—

“Needs both of us,” said the Governor. She sounded surprised, and almost regretful. “You have but half.”

“What?!” I shouted. “What do I do, then!? I can’t get free on my own! I can’t—”

Horror butted in, her severed head dangling from a cluster of hands gripping her hair. “You never could do anything alone, Heather. That’s why you require treatment.” The numbers of the equation faded and faded, growing dimmer along with the chalk clutched in my fist. I had exhausted my one chance, my one way out, because I had always been so bad at mathematics. “Now,” said Horror, dangling closer. “It’s time to put away these games and—”

Horror’s face blazed with yellow-orange firelight, cast from far to my rear.

Her eyes flew wide, then crammed shut, twinned with a scream from her lungless mouth. The nurses fell back — not in a staggering retreat as from my chilled and cold chalk-light, but as if a wave crashed over them. The nurses fell like bowling pins smashing into each other. They tumbled to the floor, crashing down in great wet heaps. Horror’s head went flying, then rolling, rolling, rolling across the darkness — until she hit the toes of the Governor’s boots.

Horror looked up, head lying on one side. The Governor returned her gaze without expression. Both were lit by the blazing flame down the corridor, pouring from some source far to my rear.

“I see you,” said the Governor.

“Ah,” said Horror. “Ma’am, I can explain—”

“No. No, you can’t.”

I tore my eyes from the tedious metaphor of internal institutional conflict and looked over my shoulder, back down the darkened corridor, facing into the flames.

A burning sword; a golden hilt. Gilt and gleaming glory, scouring the dark.

A yellow flame cut through a nurse staggering back to her feet, bisecting the twisted bones and parting the folds of grey flesh, sending the halves tumbling aside, casting leaping illumination up the walls and floors — real walls and real floor, dragging their forgotten forms from the shadowy deeps by sheer heat and light and the swinging arc of a blade.

It was Seven-Shades-of-Sunlight.

Sevens' former guise as the Drained-and-Dry-Director had gone through an unthinkable transformation. She still wore the mask of the Yellow Princess, recognisable in those ice-blue eyes, that pale swanlike throat, those sharply heightened cheekbones, that neat and tidy nose. But she had shed the exhaustion and the eye-bags, the rumpled shirt and the torn-in-haste skirt; the pens and the clipboard were nowhere to be seen, banished along with the pencil which had nestled behind her ear. Seven-Shades-of-Stressed-and-Strained was washed clean by flame and fury. Scribe no more; this Sevens was a Queen of war.

Her hair had grown wild, golden tresses glowing like burnished bronze, affixed to her brow with a gilded circlet. Her starched white shirt had become a breastplate of gold-pressed steel, the front emblazoned with a design in silver and yellow — a trio of tentacles, free and rampant, strangling a tapestry-like representation of a nurse. Her slender arms were clad in metal, soft yellow flues and whorls of flower stamped upon the armour; gloves of golden cloth protected her hands, each digit a beacon. A billowing cape flowed from her shoulders, hemmed in impossible buttery fur, the fabric burning like dawn in the darkness. A skirt of lemon-chrome mail swished about her legs as she strode forward, reflecting the light back as a million swirling points. She wore the most ridiculous shoes I had ever witnessed, utterly unsuited to real combat, but very fitting for the dream of a goddess at war — a pair of platform heels made of what was apparently solid sunlight.

In a two-handled grip she held her father's hilt, the gift he had given to me, the one Raine had pressed into Sevens' grip. From the empty hilt sprung a blade of yellow flame.

Seven-Shades-of-Sovereign-Sunshine raised her flaming sword and split another nurse in two. The nurse parted down the middle, halves hitting the floor and sinking into the darkness below.

Sevens twisted the sword about herself, eyes wide with focus, lips peeled from her teeth in a way I had never seen on the Yellow Princess before; then again, was she Princess any longer? Did I look upon something which had burst from a queenish cocoon?

All the many dozens of nurses had been knocked off their feet by the arrival of Sevens' light, but now they rose again, surging upward, scrabbling with dark and twisted hands, turning upon her with dripping syringes and clutching nets and the enclosing edges of open straitjackets. Sevens raised her sword, bellowed a war cry like the voice of a bird, and charged straight into them.

Nurses went flying, cut in two or impaled and kicked back — though I had no idea how Sevens managed all that, balanced on a pair of frankly absurd platform heels. She cut and burnt and swung, felling the parody nurses left and right, hacking and sawing, stabbing and slicing.

A larger-than-average nurse managed to get behind her, backed up by two smaller monstrosities; all three lunged for Sevens at once. For a horrible second I thought she might be overwhelmed, that this rescue would be short-lived.

"Sevens!" I screamed.

But then where the Queen-of-War had stood, Sevens' other war-form flickered into reality, as if disgorged by the darkness — Hastur's Daughter, eight feet of cone-shaped black armour frilled with yellow membranes, more alien than anything the dream could invent, and no less a queen of war. A razor-sharp tail flicked out and impaled one of the nurses, tossing her down the corridor in a careening spray of fluids too sickly to be blood. Massive crab-like claws closed on the second nurse, snipping her roughly in three. Poison stingers like hedgehog-quills impaled the third nurse a hundred times, turning her to ragged burst meat in an instant of violence.

A golden wave of downy fuzz shivered and shook, turning the air to toxic death; yellow spore-dust filled the corridor, melting the nurses down to pools of quivering flesh.

Sevens' foes all lay defeated. A few nurses staggered away, sinking into the dark, but the way between her and I was clear.

Hastur's Daughter was gone in a blink, replaced once again by the Warlike Queen.

Seven-Shades-of-Wrath-and-Ruin strode toward me, putting up her sword, a smile of such satisfaction spreading across her face.

“Heather!” she called. “Heather, I figured it out! I figured it all out! I—”

A lone nurse sprang from the shadows and crashed into Sevens from the side, ruining her regal bearing, sending her toppling over, and proving my point about those unstable shoes. Sevens went flying, struck from her feet, crashing to the floor in a clatter of golden armour. The nurse clambered all over her, scabby bleeding hands clutching for Sevens’ throat.

The Flaming Valkyrie was gone. The Blood Goblin — Seven-Shades-of-Squeak-and-Gurgle, her most familiar and intimate mask — closed a maw of needle teeth on the nurse’s hand, ripping and tearing out a massive chunk of rubbery grey flesh. The nurse recoiled. Sevens spat out the gobbet of vile meat, then—

Blinked out once again, replaced by a girl I’d seen scant times before — a scared teenager in a uniform too large for her starved body, with a pistol at her hip and desperation in her eyes.

The Gunner — the one mask Sevens showed most rarely of all — jammed her stubby black pistol into the nurse’s chin and pulled the trigger.

She emptied all the bullets, making an awful mess on the ceiling; each spot of blood drew reality from the dark, glowing red in the night. The nurse slumped, dead as a sack.

The Gunner, Seven-Shades-of-Scared-and-Shaken, rolled the dead weight off her front and clambered to her feet, shivering all over, face and uniform splattered with blood. She met my eyes, re-holstered her gun, and nodded once.

And then she was gone too.

The Yellow Princess was back, once again clad for war, carrying a sword of yellow flame in a mailed fist.

She strode to my side, heels clicking on the darkness. Each step forced the shadows to assume solid form, dragging the bare banal linoleum up from the dark waters, leaving behind footprints of reality in the abyss of infinite possibility. The light of her sword forced the shadows back, peeling the shade away from ordinary walls and the edge of an iron radiator.

Many nurses remained between me and the Governor, struggling back to their misshapen feet. But now they recoiled afresh from the clean glow which poured from the sword of Seven-Shades-of-Heir-Apparent. Hisses and warbles rose from dozens of warped and twisted throats. The nurses slunk back, too silly to be scary anymore, like a crowd of hissing extras in a bad horror film.

Sevens stopped, but did not look down at me. She stared instead at the Governor — who was still gazing downward at Horror's severed head, which lay on the dark carpet of the formless floor.

"... S-Sevens?" I croaked.

Praem, still hugged tight to my chest, suggested that I stay quiet for a moment. Gods were talking.

"You," said Seven-Shades-of-Crowned-in-Sunlight. "Pay attention."

Horror winced. "Oh, bother," she whispered.

"Not you," said Sevens. "You. The lady in charge. Pay attention."

The Governor raised her eyes of seashell pink. She looked at Sevens, unsurprised by either her appearance or the manner of her dress.

"I am," said the Governor.

"You weren't," said Sevens. "Pay attention. And take responsibility."

Sevens whirled the sword in her hands, flames licking across the walls. For a moment I thought she was going to duel the Governor for the prize of my mind; I started to croak a denial, choked by my own surprise. I did not want her to kill the Governor, I did not want her to kill the Eye! If she fought the Governor and banished her, I would never have my answers, never have my closure, and Maisie would be lost in the dark forever.

But my refusal was unnecessary; Sevens' flaming flourish served a dual purpose, not the purpose of a duel. The flash of fire drove back the nurses who seemed to be regrouping, and brought the point of the regal blade downward, to indicate Horror's head.

"Take responsibility," said Sevens.

The Governor shrugged, hands still firmly in her pockets. “I was never in charge of the night shift. It was never mine.”

“It may not have been your fault, but you have to take responsibility regardless.” Sevens removed one hand from the hilt of her sword and indicated me with a finger clothed in golden silk. “For her.”

The Governor looked down at Horror’s head again. Horror pulled an oily and ingratiating grimace.

“You really don’t have to, you know?” Horror said. “Ma’am, you can just go back to your project. All these details are beneath you. Let the staff handle this. That’s why you employ us—”

“Silence,” said Sevens — neither loud nor sharp, but with a cold fire of absolute certainty which belonged nowhere but in the mouth of a monarch.

Horror choked on her own words. Sevens stepped forward and jabbed the tip of her sword into the flesh of Horror’s neck, lifting her off the ground like a scrap of meat on a skewer. Flames licked Horror’s cheeks and scalp, but the fire did not consume or blacken her flesh, nor even singe the ends of her hair.

But it clearly hurt. “Ow ow ow ow!” she chattered. “Ow oh ow ow oh, ow! Hot! Hot! Hot! Ow!”

Sevens ignored the complaints and thrust the speared head toward the Governor. “Take responsibility.”

The Governor just gazed at Horror’s head, as if confused. “But—”

“I can become your equal,” said Seven-Shades-of-Storm-and-Strife. “I can be any bit as great and terrible as my father at his worst. That is one of the paths open to me now — the blinding of those who see, the never-ending prison of the self, the incomplete work. The unread book by the death bed. I can be those things, if I wish, and I can be them for you. But I would rather not. I would rather remain as I am. Take responsibility.”

The Governor got halfway through another shrug, then stopped and removed her hands from her pockets. She produced a towel from somewhere — had she held onto it when she had tossed the head into the crowd of nurses?

The Governor reached out with the towel and accepted Horror’s head.

“You really don’t have to wrap me up again, you know?” Horror rattled on. “A good manager listens to her staff, especially down at ground level. There’s all sorts of things you don’t comprehend or can’t see without— mm! Mmmm-mmm—mm! Mmm!”

Horror’s chatter was muffled with a wad of towel. Within a few seconds the Governor had her wrapped neatly back up once more.

Sevens retreated a couple of steps, returning to my side, heels clicking on the floor; I thought she was going to look down at me, a monarch gazing from her lofty perch. But to my surprise she turned her sword so the tip touched the floor, holding it like a cane. Then she lowered herself in turn, going down on one knee before me.

The Yellow Princess gazed deep within me, with eyes blue as ice and a-glitter with the reflections of raging flame.

“Sevens?” I rasped.

“It is I, kitten,” she purred. “As I always was.”

“Uh ... um ... ” I tried to find the words, but found my throat rather painful. I swallowed hard, then looked her up and down. “Uh ... ”

“Say it, kitten.”

“You ... Sevens, you look absolutely absurd. You’re wearing nine-inch platform heels with an armoured skirt. You’ve got gloves made of golden cloth. You have a crown!”

Sevens smiled, a tiny kink of her royal lips. “And you are the only one in all the worlds who could get away with saying that.”

I sighed and laughed at the same time. “Thank you for saving me. Thank you. I ... I think I was about to die. You saved my life, again. How many times is that now?”

“Counting is for bankers and architects, kitten.”

“Are you ... awake, Sevens? I’m sorry for asking, it’s just that the dream keeps getting more and more confusing. Did the sword wake you? What happened? Does it work in the same way for you as for everybody else? You seem ... coherent.”

Sevens took a deep breath. “Oh, I am so much more than awake. I am flying, kitten. I understand it all, now.”

“Understand what?”

Sevens glanced at the sword. Her lips barely moved, but a smile entered her eyes, a glow of pleasure and promise. She glanced back over her shoulder, at the Governor and the darkness. The misshapen nurses were beginning to regroup again, shambling out of invisible side-corridors, raising clutches of dripping syringes and the iron maidens of straitjackets. They crept forward, ignoring the Governor, shambling to press against the rim of Sevens’ firelight.

“It seems we have little time to discuss the details,” said Sevens. “The rush of the stream does not afford us many moments to speak.” She turned to me all the same; nurses loomed behind her shoulders, peering out of the darkness with grey expanses of eyeless flesh and sagging mounds of folded skin. “But the short version is simple enough.”

She jerked the hilt of the sword toward me, as if to show me the proof of what she had become.

“The ... the sword?” I asked. “Yes, it was from your father. He asked us to give it to you.”

“My father made his own story,” she said. “The hubris, the arrogance, the fall from grace, it was never merely his obsession. It was him! It was his own story, with my mother. To wed a human, with such a limited span of life, that was his kingly arrogance, his ultimate hubris. Her death — by old age, by life, by nature — his own fall from grace. Do you see?”

Nurses pressed in from all sides, fighting against the glow of Sevens’ blade. I eyed them with my heart in the throat. “Sevens. Sevens, I think you were right, we don’t have time!”

“He made his own story,” she said. “Cutting through reality with the edge of the narrative. A pen that is a sword and a sword that is a pen. But he made a poor choice! Without that, my mother may have become like him. She needed not be mortal in the end, except for his nature.”

Sevens reached out and tucked the edges of the yellow blanket close to my chest, covering Praem on one side and my heart on the other. She muttered a tiny thank you to Praem, for looking after me. Then she gently plucked the stick of chalk from my fingers and slipped it inside the blanket too.

“Sevens, Sevens we—”

“But me!?” Sevens roared, rising to her feet again in a sudden rush. “I can make whatever story I wish! And I choose one where my love rides free!”

She swung her father’s sword in an overhand arc, bisecting the nearest nurse with a sweep of flame. Before the halves had time to fall to the floor, Sevens leaned down and used one arm to sweep me upward as swiftly as she had moved her sword.

All of a sudden I was back on my feet, my crutch pressed into my left armpit, Praem clutched to my chest.

Sevens took me by the shoulder and shoved me toward the Governor. I staggered, the echo of pain screaming upward from my left shin, strangled to quiet by the morphine in my bloodstream. The Governor put out one hand to catch my fall, but I recoiled in confusion and disgust, managing to catch myself at the last second, heaving onto the support of my crutch.

The Governor stared at me, then shrugged, turned away, and carried on toward the final light.

Sevens turned to the nurses, sword held high. “Go with your God, kitten!”

“Aren’t you coming with us?” I cried out. “Sevens, come with me!”

“My fight is here, with the nature of the narrative,” she said, whirling her father’s sword like a flaming baton. “Yours lies ahead, with the one who wronged you. Go with her, kitten. You have to do what the rest of us cannot! Go on!”

Praem suggested I take the opening; to do otherwise would waste Sevens’ efforts, and anger a wild and warlike future queen.

Besides, Sevens did not need any help. Her pen had become a sword, and the dream — the play, the narrative, all gone to horror and darkness — could not stand before the edits wrought by that blade.

“I love you, Sevens!” I cried out. “Stay safe, please!”

Sevens roared with cold laughter, sword splitting another nurse, driving back the crowd with flashes of fire. The nurses shambled past the Governor and I as if we were no longer present, totally focused on swarming toward the towering golden figure of Seven-Shades-of-Sunlight.

I turned away with regret and reluctance in my heart, a crutch wedged beneath my armpit, and hobbled after the Governor.

She waited for me at the plain double-doors, beneath the fluorescent bar of clean yellow light. I staggered up to her, sweating and panting with the effort of walking on my crutch and my wounded leg, body singing with the adrenaline and fear, throat sore and raw from the nurses' many fingers. I glanced back over my shoulder, down the long dark corridor sinking into empty black. Seven-Shades-of-Sunlight was nothing but a distant spark, almost smothered by the staff of Cygnet Asylum.

"She'll be okay," said the Governor.

"What?" I twisted back to her, lurching sideways on my crutch. "How can you know that?"

"She will."

The Governor turned away and pushed one of the doors aside. She stepped through the gap, into safety beyond the dark. I cast one final glance back at Sevens' private war, then left her behind.

Over the threshold was more darkness — ordinary darkness, a refreshing plunge into the cool waters of private shade. My slippers and the tip of my crutch caught hard on the rough and scratchy surface of a carpet. The door clicked shut behind me. A familiar old feeling swelled inside my chest, bitter-sweet and distant, and brought the prickle of tears to my eyes.

For the ghost of a moment I felt like a squid who had squeezed into a gap between two shelves of ocean rock.

Had my other selves, my other six, my abyssal side, been inside me all along?

Then the Governor reached past my shoulder and clicked on the lights; the cephalopod sensation fled, driven deeper into the rocks by electric illumination.

"Ah ..." A dying murmur escaped my lips. I sniffed back tears, then took a deep breath. Praem hugged my chest. I had to concentrate.

The Governor strode away, toward what I could only assume was her desk.

The Office of the Governor of Cygnet Hospital, Asylum, Prison, and Maximum Security Containment Facility was refreshingly normal after our journey through the dreamlike corridors of night. The room was very wide, carpeted in plush yet scratchy institutional brown; the walls were the plain off-white slight-cream of a doctor's office. The skirting board, light fixtures, window frame, and all other such flourishes were made of a rich dark wood polished to a high sheen. The room was illuminated by a trio of powerful incandescent bulbs in the ceiling, cupped behind plastic shades, and a matching quartet of standing lamps, all pointed at the walls so as to splash their light back upon the room, leaving behind no scrap of shadow or shade.

A large window dominated the right side of the room, looking out over the hospital grounds from four or five floors up. The gardens and lawns were now freed from the impossible darkness, lit by a gentle whisper of silver-grey moonlight, flickering between the distant trees and sliding across the empty grass. From that angle I could not see the false sky above, the wrinkled black underside of the Eye.

A short row of unremarkable filing cabinets flanked the window, alongside one of those glass display cases in which accomplished people liked to show off their trophies. Next to that was a tall, imposing, powerful bookcase made of ornamental wood. The bookcase was overflowing, but the letters on the spines of the resident tomes made my eyes hurt and my vision blur with ocular pain. The glass display case was stuffed with trophies and cups of all shapes and sizes — but the shapes made me feel sick and the sizes played tricks on my sight. Lining the wall next to the bookcase was a mosaic of diplomas and degrees, the exact sort of things one expected to see upon the wall of a distinguished professional — except the ink had run and rendered the words meaningless, turning each award and qualification into a smear of grey.

The seat of the Eye's mind boasted two desks. The first stood toward the rear of the room, right where it should be, and was pretty unremarkable — a great slab of oak with a jumble of stationary and documents atop, pens and pencils littered everywhere, a discarded newspaper in one corner, nothing that one would not expect to find in such a place. The only element out of sync with reality was the total absence of any words on the documents, the newspaper, or the notepads. All the papers were blank white, empty of content, only there in form.

A high-backed, expensive-looking office chair stood behind the desk, mirrored by a low trio of uncomfortable plastic seats in front. No warm welcome for any members of staff who wished to address the Eye in person.

It was that first desk which the Governor walked up to. She tossed Horror's head onto the surface with a wet and meaty thump, then stared at the result for a moment. Eventually she turned back around and looked at me again.

"The archives are through there," she said. But I wasn't really listening.

A second desk filled the entire left-hand side of the office. Polished steel stretched from wall to wall. Before that desk stood a chair more at home in the lair of a cartoon mad scientist than a doctor's office — a huge reclining throne of plush fabric layered atop reinforced black plastic and sleek reflective metal, mounted on a ball-and-socket joint in the floor, so that any person seated within could turn the chair any which way, via the aid of a small electric control box mounted on one of the curved arms.

The second desk itself contained nothing, serving only as the foundation for a framework of monitor mounts.

Dozens upon dozens of screens stretched upward from that desk, lining the wall all the way to the ceiling, leaning forward as if sagging under their own weight, sprouting like dark fungus upon the spreading boughs of an electric fern. All different shapes and sizes and styles were represented — modern flat-screen televisions stood flush with the curved glass of cathode ray tubes; grainy CCTV footage unspooled while framed by high-definition video; film stock flickered and jumped and bloomed with imperfections shoulder-to-shoulder with to unshakeable digital clarity.

"The archives are through there," the Governor repeated.

She pointed at a door, a steel door with a trio of heavy locks built into the wall, next to the tree of monitors.

I spared the door only the briefest of glances. I staggered across the office, crutch and slippers scuffing on the carpet. I lurched up to that steel desk and gripped the arm of the chair. I craned my neck to look upward, to watch the screens.

To observe.

On one camera feed, my own residential room; on another, Raine's cell down in the prison. Both empty.

Another screen showed Sevens, whirling in fire and flame in a dark corridor, slaying nurses left and right. On yet another — Twil and Eevee in the infirmary, Twil with her shoulder to the filing cabinet against the door, the door buckling and breaking, Eevee shouting silent words from her wheelchair.

On another — Raine! My Raine! Raine, sprinting down some nighted hallway, clutching her machete in one hand and the blooded paw of a girl in the other — a girl with ruddy red skin and black hair and Zheng's face on a body too small to be Zheng, her lips smeared with fresh blood and scraps of meat, the pair pursued by a crowd of things that should have been nurses. Raine was laughing. Zheng was howling. Away they went.

Another screen, and another, and another, and another! My eyes whirled across hundreds of views, inside and outside the hospital, into the patient wings, burrowed past the staff areas, dripping down in the prison. All of it, all at once, all without filter. I peered into every dark corner of the earth, every hidden secret of the asylum, every mind and heart and pair of eyes plugged straight into my vision.

There was Lozzie, poncho fluttering out behind her, leading a crowd of patients around a corner in the depths of the hospital. They blundered into something not-quite-doctor and fell upon the monster like a crowd of piranhas upon a carcass, shivs and knives rising and falling in dozens of little fists.

The patients were everywhere, on so many screens — some moving in ones and twos, scurrying and skittering through the dark, holding hands and hiding in corners. Others moved in big packs, flowing like water, avoiding concentrations of nurses. Lozzie's revolutionaries were laying their groundwork for tomorrow's dawn.

But I could not stay. My vision whirled away, as if I couldn't control my own eyes.

Down into the prison I saw a vortex of shadow — Praem's other half, flanked by half a dozen Knights in their armour and visors. Guns raised and bucked in silent hands, firing at something beyond my sight. Not at Praem. They were on her side. Our side. Us.

Had they been fighting all night, all day, for all time?

Sight whirled on. I couldn't stay with them either.

On another monitor — an exterior view, deep in the woods. A flash of russet fur flickered past, vulpine tail whipping out behind. Shapes lumbered through the trees behind the fox, led on a merry chase deeper into the woods.

Exterior views flashed by, rolling across my mind. On another camera a white hump of ridged armour crashed over a low wall, fleeing a line of dark figures armed with crackling spears. Was that a Caterpillar? It was moving too fast, and so were my eyes. Tree lines and horizon and the exterior wall sped by, blurring into night and moonlight and out of sight. One section of the exterior wall look crushed or broken, bent inward by some great weight; I tried to go back, tried to focus on the gigantic fluttering shape that blocked out the night itself, but I could not stall. My eyes whipped on, as if drawn by gravity, down and down and down, into the black hole of endless observation.

One cluster of monitors showed a place I had not seen before — steel corridors, bulkhead doors, flickering lights, all placed to guard huge glass tanks of murky water.

There, my sight finally slowed.

All the views of that hidden place were drowned in emergency lights, strobing red and orange, silent sirens reflected off pools of standing water; many of the glass tanks had burst, flooding the hallways with brackish water, dripping off metal gantries, pouring down empty lift shafts. Gunfire flashed in the blinding darkness, chewing into walls, chasing slender figures I could not pin down as my eyes jumped from screen to screen. Bodies lay upon the floor, bleeding dark ichor into spilled water from the shattered aquariums. A moment of panic, but then no — they were not Knights, no, not ours at all. But if those armed guards were not our Knights, then what were they? I saw no face, no flesh, just blood and armour and broken guns. But I could not stop. My eyes tore onward.

Half-glimpsed forms slid through the shadows, their sinuous motion oddly familiar. Were those the ones who had slain the guards, and still fought them now? Had they burst their watery prisons and surprised their jailers? Did they know about Lozzie's revolution? Did they know about me?

My eyes followed the logic of the screens, spiralling toward the centre of this dirty secret.

And there, in the core, was the largest glass tank of all. Set amid hissing pipes and high guardrails, warning signs and wary checkpoints, ringed by automatic guns and electric fences, it was armoured in glass many meters thick, large enough for a pod of whales, and filled with an ocean of water.

A single mote of flesh floated in the distant core of that main tank, deeper down and further away than the floor of the abyss itself. The flesh, the figure, the hint of life — it was little more than a smear of pale skin, obscured behind glass and pressure and murk.

Upon that, my eyes finally halted.

I knew what I beheld.

“Maisie?”

bedlam boundary – 24.25

And there, at last, she was.

That distant speck of flesh bore neither face nor feature; a formless smudge crushed in the shackles of ten trillion gallons of pressure and darkness. She — for it was she, it could be no other — was too far away, too deeply buried in her watery grave, beyond meters of glass and miles of ocean, locked in the heart of a machine of which she was both purpose and core, the reason for this reality, the fuel in this engine of suffering.

But still she struggled.

Even at that abyssal distance, hints of desperate motion shivered and shuddered the waters about that scrap of humanity, as if she was trying to swim. But her fight availed her nothing; she was held in place by a million wires glinting like spider-silk beneath moonlight, thrumming in silent mockery as her motion churned the deeps. Each stainless steel line linked that speck of flesh to the interior walls of the tank, holding her in place as surely as the pressure and the glass and the murk. Even if all the water in the world were drained, she would still not be free. She would have to be cut out of her prison, line by line.

Her name escaped my lips again; I tasted my own tears upon my tongue.

“Maisie?”

It was her. It was her. It was her. I could not see her face, but I knew it was her, with all the logic of the dream and the play.

My right hand splayed against the monitor, my broken reflection peering back between my fingers. I pressed — harder and harder and harder still — until the bones of my hand ground against the cold glass. I showed my teeth, hissing and whining with frustration beyond human speech, willing the dream to bend and break beneath my will, to push through the screen and tumble free onto the gantries and bare metal of that hidden place, with the leaking water and the flashing alarms and the lethal lithe predators darting through the shadows. For one glorious moment I thought I might shatter the dream asunder just as I had reality, to burst this final barrier of video and camera, to place myself before my lost twin sister.

But the screen was only glass. It creaked in the monitor's frame.

I screamed in a way I never had before, howling with rage and denial. I pulled back my hand and thumped the screen, but nothing happened. I screamed again, and hit the monitor again, but all I did was hurt my hand.

Praem, still tucked down in the crook of my right arm, bade me gently to stop. This was neither window nor door, it was a camera feed. Observation at a distance, with no touch or taste or truth of presence. Stop, Heather. Stop. Stop. Stop.

I ignored her and pulled back my fist a third time, hiccuping and choking and heaving for breath. Maisie was so close!

Praem pointed out I would need both hands intact and unbroken, if I was going to free Maisie from the water and the wires. This would not help her. Stop, Heather. Stop.

I stopped, lowered my fist, and nodded, choking down a final sob. Crying would not save my sister now. I scrubbed my tears from my cheeks, sniffing back the rest, then cast another glance at that struggling scrap of flesh.

"Maisie, I'm coming," I whispered. I framed her form with my fingers again, palm on unfeeling glass. "You just hold on. I'm almost there. I love you."

If she heard me, she showed no sign.

Before I turned away from the wall of monitors, I took note of one essential detail; on the bezel of each monitor was a label — sometimes printed, sometimes stamped, some hand-written with the indecipherable scrawl of a professional doctor. Many of them were nothing but corridor numbers or locations within the hospital — 'Floor 3, Corridor 8B', 'Main Hallway, Ground Floor', 'Cell Block H'. I had seen no physical cameras during my time out there in the nightmare of Cygnet Asylum, but that hardly mattered. None of this was literal. This bank of monitors was the Eye's view of the world, of Wonderland, or at least of what I had broken Wonderland into.

The label on the bezel of Maisie's monitor read: 'Maximum Security

Containment Facility / Core / Subject Zero.'

Eyes hot with the memory of tears, cold fury in my throat, with a quivering in my belly and my fingers clenched into a fist, I turned away from the wall of monitors, the inside of the Eye's sight, and fixed my own observation upon the Governor.

She stood by the other, smaller, mundane desk, dark blonde hair framed by the night beyond the wide window on the opposite wall, like a halo of light in the darkness. One hand rested atop the towel-wrapped bundle of Horror's head. Eyes of soft and rain-streaked sunrise stared right through me.

Her lips parted with a moist click, deafening in the silence of the office. "The archives are through—"

"Maximum Security Containment Facility," I snapped. "Is that the 'Box' I've heard the nurses talking about?"

The Governor closed her mouth. Her gaze wandered away to rove across the monitors, then drag itself over the walls, then finally yawning wide at the door to the archives.

"Mm," she grunted. "MSCF. Box. Same thing."

"How do I get in there?"

"Through one of the main security doors," she said, voice faraway and badly distracted. "There's four of those. But they're locked and guarded. And then inside there's guns, and checkpoints, and other special guards. All sorts of things."

"Take me there. Get me inside."

Her gaze wandered back to mine.

"Take me there!" I repeated, my temper flaring hot and furious. "You're in charge of this place, the hospital, this 'containment facility', whatever, all of it is you, yours! You take me there, you open the door, and you let my sister go!"

The Governor's eyes wandered away again. "I can't do that."

"You—" I almost shouted, stomping forward, stopped only by the jarring flare of pain up the length of my left shin. My crutch almost slipped, threatening to send me sprawling. I righted myself and groped for the arm of the massive steel throne. The seat swung around on the ball-and-socket joint set into the floor, smooth and silent and perfectly balanced, inviting me to sit.

I all but collapsed into the chair, clutching Praem to my chest and my crutch to my side. Praem gently suggested I not get too comfortable; I assured her there was no threat of that, not with Maisie so close.

I panted for breath, sweat on my brow, shaking with anger and frustration and that heady drug I'd felt so little of for half my life — hope.

"Why?" I demanded, trying to keep my voice level. "Why can't you take me there? Why can't you let her go? You're the one in charge here, aren't you? Or is this another 'night shift' thing? I refuse to believe that I'm somehow the one keeping her imprisoned. I'm not, that's absurd. That's been you, all along. It's always been you. Sevens is dealing with my nightmares, back out there. Everything from this point onward is you!"

The Governor shrugged beneath her white laboratory coat. "You've seen the containment facility. I can't just walk in there and release her by myself. Questions would be asked. Systems would lock down, or lock up, or lock us out. We would probably both get shot."

"Then we get shot!" I shouted. "Fine!"

The Governor glanced at me for an extended moment, then away again. "No."

I sighed and rubbed the bridge of my nose, then looked back over my shoulder at the wall of monitors, at the scrap of Maisie inside that distant tank of water; the throne of steel made it easy, rotating on the ball-and-socket joint with the lightest touch. I stared at Maisie for a long time, perhaps thirty seconds, maybe thirty minutes. The other views on the monitors tempted and tugged at my peripheral vision, but they could not dislodge me from my goal, my twin, my Maisie.

I turned back.

"What do I need to do?" I asked. "To get in there, and get her out, what do I need to do?"

The Governor shrugged again. "I don't know. She's been there as long as I can remember."

On the desk, Horror's decapitated head twitched and let out a muffled, “Mm-mm-mmmm!” from behind her mouthful of towel. The Governor glanced at her without interest. “Mmmmm! Mmm-mmm!”

“Be quiet,” said the Governor.

“Mmmm!”

“Quiet.”

“Wait,” I interrupted. “Wait. Ungag her for me, please? I may as well hear her suggestion, it’s not as if I’ve got many other leads right now, if you can’t help me. Go on, please, remove her gag.”

The Governor unwrapped the lower part of the towel, leaving Horror still blind and bound, then uncorked her mouth.

“Pah! Peh, ugh. Bleh!” Horror spat and stuck out her tongue, working her lips up and down. “Oh, that was just frightful. You know there’s really no reason to keep me gagged—”

“How do I get into the Box?” I demanded. “The Maximum Security Containment Facility. Give me something useful or you’re going back in the towel. Talk.”

Horror tutted and sighed. Her head wobbled on the desk as if she was trying to tilt it sideways. “Oh, Heather. This is what I’ve been trying to protect you from! You don’t want to go in there! You do not want to confront that. You’re not ready or able or—”

“Wrap her back up,” I said.

“Wait!” Horror yelled. “Just look, look at the screens! You don’t want to go in there!”

I almost ignored her, but then some perverse and darkly urgent need sent my eyes over my shoulder, back toward the monitors.

And there, for a split-second, caught in the flickering, jerking, blood-red light of a blaring alarm, something looked back.

Sharp and spined and slick all over, strobing with dark-lit skin; too many teeth in a wide-set maw, below eyes made of glowing coal and bright-blown toxins; ghostly membranes dragged behind, flitting through the shadows; naked flesh was wet with ocean water, blood and gore dripping from clawed hands.

It vanished into the gloom, somewhere beyond the base of Maisie’s vast aquarium.

"You see!" Horror heaved. "You cannot go in there, not with those things running around, you—"

I burst out laughing in relief. Horror did not understand me at all. And Maisie was not alone.

"Wrap her back up," I told the Governor. "Please."

Horror was gagged again in seconds, muffled behind her towel. She complained a little, 'mmm-mm'ing into the fabric, and then fell silent.

"Now," I said. "Please, how do I get in there? How do I free Maisie? Just tell me how."

The Governor shrugged.

I took a deep breath and tried to swallow my anger, my bitterness, my hate; the realisation that Maisie was not alone did help, but she was still beyond my reach. I could hate the Eye with incredible ease, for here we were inside the seat of her mind, with the evidence of her eyes before us — or behind my back, splashed all over the wall of monitors — and she still claimed she did not know how to let Maisie go.

"If ... if forgiveness is what will free her, then I will forgive you," I said, squeezing words up past the lump in my throat. "I am willing to accept that all of this was a mistake, an accident, ten years ago. We — Maisie and I — we fell into your world, into Wonderland, by accident, because of the actions of a man we'd never met, and you didn't even know about, who was trying to feed you with things you didn't even want or understand. And you took us for your own, because that was all you could see, isn't that right? All you could see was yourself, reflected in us, in our minds, or something, I don't know. I'm willing to accept this was an accident. I'm willing to forgive you. But you have to let her go."

"I can't. We'll be stopped. There's nothing to be done."

I clenched my teeth, anger throbbing back. "If I'm your daughter, then isn't she your daughter too? Don't you want to free her? Can't you see she's suffering?"

"You are. She is. I do. I can. But I can't. We'll be stopped."

“By other parts of you!” I snapped. “I don’t care if there’s armed guards, or automatic guns, or any of those things! You’re the authority here! You’re the boss, the ego, the mind. Let her go! Just let her go!”

The Governor stared at me for a moment, then picked up Horror’s head, dangling by a fistful of towel. “You couldn’t stop her.”

“What? What does that have to do with it?”

“You couldn’t stop her. You needed the Director. I can’t stop this. You and I are the same.”

I frowned at the Governor for a long moment, then grudgingly accepted she may have had a point; if Horror and the nurses were rooted in my own trauma, yet I could not simply order them to cease, then whatever this all represented for the Eye was not truly within her control either.

I snorted. “Being in charge doesn’t give you control, then? It’s lonely at the top?”

“Yes.”

“All right.” I sighed. “What if I help you? Can you free her then?”

The Governor looked down at the floor before my feet. Her expressionless face creased with a puzzled frown.

“The archives would be incomplete,” she said.

“ ... pardon?”

“The archives would be incomplete. I’d have to start over again. It’s already taken so long.”

“What? I don’t understand, what does—”

“Help me with the project, with the archives,” she said, raising those pink-soft eyes to meet mine. “And then it’ll be done.” The Governor blinked. “Though I still won’t be able to get you in there to reach her. But they might.”

She raised her arm and pointed at the wall of monitors. I glanced back over my shoulder and realised she was not indicating Maisie. She meant the others, my friends and family and allies, all of them.

Raine and Zheng careening down a hallway, shoulder-checking a nurse aside; Lozzie leading her advance pack of feral patients, arming themselves with broken table legs and stolen crowbars and makeshift shivs; Praem and her group of Knights down in the dripping deeps of the prison, fighting some unseen foe; the slamming sextet of dark shapes out in the grounds which could only be the Caterpillars, chased by a mob of clambering shadows; the sleek dark form of the fox darting through the trees; Eeve and Twil, holding the door of the infirmary; the unknown giant shape looming over the broken perimeter wall of the hospital grounds; and Sevens, waging her one-woman war against the staff in a corridor of abyssal darkness.

Lozzie's revolution was bucking and tearing at the bonds of the dream. By morning the battle would be in full swing, one way or another.

All I had to do was make it through the night, and we'd start pulling down these walls, Governor or no Governor.

I turned back to her. "Do I even need your help?"

"I need yours."

"... pardon?"

She shrugged. "The project is unfinished. The archives are incomplete. Please. I don't want to go back again."

Realisation was cold comfort. I longed to leave this office and rejoin the fray, though my own limited strength and wounded body could make little contribution. But now I understood. My role was here, in the heart of the dream. Sevens had said it so clearly; I was the only one who could solve the Eye's problem, the only one who could fix this knot of trauma, however alien it might be.

With the Governor on our side, the revolution could not be stopped, and the way would lie clear to Maisie's prison.

"I help you, you help me, that's how we're going to do this?" I asked. "I help you with this project, and you'll smooth the passage of the revolution? You'll call off the nurses, announce a ceasefire, whatever I need? You'll do all of that?"

The Governor shrugged. "I don't see why not."

"Promise me."

“I promise you.”

I bit back a thick wad of anger still lingering in my throat; this was not what I had expected. I needed more than this, more than just a resolution. I needed closure, but maybe that was not to be had. Maybe that was the price of Maisie’s rescue.

“Do you ... ” I swallowed, knowing I would regret this. “Do you understand what you’ve done to us? To her? To me? Do you understand any of it?”

The Governor stared at me, then looked away, to the big steel door on the right of the monitors. “The archives are through there.”

I sighed, bitter and disappointed. Would I never have real answers? “Why did I escape and Maisie didn’t?”

“I don’t know.”

“Why did you keep her here this whole time? Why did you never let her go?”

“I couldn’t.”

“Why not? What does this metaphor really mean?”

A shrug.

“Why did you try to teach me hyperdimensional mathematics? Why the ten years of nightmares? Why any of it? Why? Just give me something, anything.”

The Governor’s gaze flickered back to me. “I need to see.” She looked away and pointed again. “The archives are through there.”

Praem quite sensibly suggested that these lines of inquiry were fruitless, and I was sadly forced to agree. The Governor may have been the Eye’s ego, but she simply did not have any answers to my questions. In truth there was never a figure I could take vengeance upon for Maisie’s ten long years of confinement, and what that had done to me in turn. The Governor was no more than a metaphor herself, a representative of something which simply did not understand human beings. I had already gotten my revenge, hadn’t I? I had cast a harpoon into the Eye to force it wide, to force it to not look away from me. Revenge was pointless. Revenge would not bring back my sister.

I used my crutch to lever myself up and out of the massive rotating steel throne, staggering back to my feet. The Governor stepped away from the desk, heading for the door.

“No,” I said, pointing with Praem, pointing at Horror’s gagged and blindfolded head left behind on the desk. “She’s not staying here unsupervised. Sevens told you to take responsibility for her, so take responsibility.”

The Governor went back to the desk and picked up Horror’s head. Horror sighed through her gag, clearly disappointed.

I limped over to the heavy steel door. The Governor joined me and operated the locks built into the wall — one was a combination lock, the second a code pad, the third a thumb-print reader. Each lock beeped in turn, little red lights flashing to green. The door to the archives popped open with a hiss of air as the pressures equalised. The Governor swung the door wide, steel hinges silent in their dress of grease.

A bare concrete staircase, lit by naked bulbs behind wire cages, going down.

The Governor stepped over the threshold and descended the stairs, boots echoing against each concrete step. She did not look back to make sure I was following.

I glanced over my shoulder one last time, to gaze upon that hint of Maisie, that struggling scrap trapped in her ocean of water, a speck of pale meat flickering and twitching behind the glass of the monitor.

A face peered back at me from another screen — skin of peach-leather and dove-down and void-dark, shifting into a dozen colours, sleek and smooth and sharper than sound. Muscles rolled, oiled and buttery, built for grace and speed and sinuous perfection. Clean spines, razor teeth, poison quivering in her barbed tips. Polychromatic eyes went yellow, then pink, then black. Membranous wings unfolded over her shoulders, slick with water dripping from their rims. The webbed fingers of one hand splayed against the glass of the camera, as if she was trying to push her way out of the prison and into the world, as if she was trying to reach me — as I was her.

“I’m coming for you, too,” I whispered. “Hold on, and watch Maisie. I’ll be there soon.”

The face of Homo abyssus vanished, darting back into the shadows of the Maximum Security Containment Facility, chased by the stutter-flash of silent gunfire.

I turned to follow the Governor, down into the archives. The metal door swung shut behind me with a sharp click, echoing on the bare concrete.

“Down we go,” I hissed.

Descending those concrete stairs began easily enough, but did not stay trivial for long; I took the first flight quickly, my crutch-tip gripping each step, my slippers scuffing, my left leg grumbling but not bursting into open complaint. The stairs met a narrow landing, then turned, then continued downward into the harsh-lit earth. The Governor stayed a few paces ahead as we went. A second flight led me forward, then a third snagged my soles, then a fourth slowed my feet, all joined by those narrow landings of dull and empty concrete. The electric lights blazed, not a shadow in any pitted nook or rough corner, just harsh white illumination forever and ever. Our footsteps echoed down and down and down.

By the third flight my left leg began to ache worse than before. By the fourth the arm which gripped my crutch whined with the effort of holding me up. By the fifth I almost stumbled, lurching forward, scrabbling with my free hand to catch the bare metal bannister. I did, and saved myself a trip to the floor.

Six, seven, eight, nine, on and on, down and down, numbing my mind to nothing but a nub. By ten flights down I was sweating and shaking. No abyssally-toned muscles here, no Raine to carry me in her arms, no tentacles to fling myself down the shaft at top speed. Just feet and sweat and down, down, down, down, down, down—

On the eleventh flight, I tripped.

My crutch flew out from under me with a catch-start slip. My right hand flailed to catch the bannister again, but I could not do so without letting go of Praem. I felt a desperate grip flutter at my elbow — strong and firm, secure in her competence, Praem trying to keep me steady. But her perfection was not enough, not without her full physical body. I screamed, careening forward, about to crash down the flight of stairs and slam my skull into the wall or bounce my neck off a corner or break a bone on a—

The Governor caught me, hands on my shoulders.

She righted me without comment, jammed the crutch firmly back into my hand, and tucked Praem into the crook of my other arm.

“Watch your step,” she said. “Long way down.”

Then she turned away and carried on.

I expected to feel some shivering disgust at her touch, but her hands were simply hands, neither too warm nor too cold. She had smelled of nothing except the fabric of her lab coat. I tucked Praem halfway into my yellow blanket, just over my heart, so she could peer out and keep watch, then placed my right hand on the handrail. No chances this time, no messing about. I gripped hard, and carried on down.

And down.

And down.

And down.

Down.

Down.

Dow-

D—

—

The concrete stairwell terminated after twenty seven flights of stairs. I reached the bottom ragged with exhaustion, sagging under my own body weight, but still in one merciful piece — except for all the sweat I’d shed into my clothes, technically. The final landing was a plain concrete box with one door leading out.

The Governor paused before that plain white interior door, her hand hovering a few inches from the stainless steel handle, for far too long.

“What’s wrong now?” I asked.

“This is it,” she said.

“The archives, yes? Is something wrong?”

“Nobody but me has ever been inside before,” she said. “This is a strange feeling. It is enough that you help me.”

The handle creaked, as did the hinges; a taste of cold fog and the scent of paper brushed my face. The Governor stepped through without fanfare, onto an oddly familiar thin brown carpet. I followed on her heels, prepared for the utmost extremes of alien metaphor.

Instead, I found myself standing in a library, one which wore familiar clothes.

Rolling stacks stretched off into fog-drowned distance — library shelves made of grey plastic, tall and heavy and wide-set, mounted in rails on the floor, with handles on their ends so they could be moved back and forth. I recognised those shelves, that configuration, that colour, that shape; the carpet, the scent in the air, the close-packed silence. All of it I knew so very well.

All of this was Sharrowford University Library, wrapped in heavy fog lying in dense canals between the shelves.

Endless rolling stacks marched away into the fog ahead of us, swallowed up by the grey gloom and questing tendrils of mist. To the left and right, the same scene repeated at a forty five degree angle, then at another forty five degree angle, endless rows of shelves stretching out into misty infinity. The Governor and I had emerged from a solid cylinder of concrete which rose up and vanished into the hanging fog a mile above our heads. To either side of the concrete cylinder more rows of stacks stretched away into endless mist, and the same behind, so that the stacks formed an octagonal shape around this vertical entrance to the archives. The cylinder was the hub of a wheel, the rows of shelves a set of sixteen parallel spokes. But the rim was lost in the fog, too far away to see.

The Governor shut the door.

“Here we are,” she said. “The archives.”

Her voice was muffled by the fog, swallowed by the immensity of the dreamlike room, sinking into millions upon millions of books.

I tore my eyes away from the clinging infinity of book and shelf, and looked closer to hand. The space between the concrete cylinder and the start of the shelves was perhaps twenty feet of plain brown carpet. A desk stood close to the door — nothing special, a simple writing desk with sturdy legs and a wooden top. It was littered with bound manuscripts in flimsy plastic covers, like archived dissertations in the basement of the real Sharrowford University Library. A few battered hardback tomes weighed down the various manuscripts, stuffed with bookmarks and little strips of paper.

Further away from the door was a free-standing blackboard, half-covered in an unfinished equation which I recognised; it was the same equation the Governor had been writing on the blackboard in the infirmary, the one she had halted before handing me the chalk, expecting me to finish the mathematics. This version ended at the exact same point.

A little way toward the start of the library stacks themselves stood a long, low table made of clean white wipe-clean plastic. It was occupied by a lumpy, incomplete figure.

I gaped at the thing lying on the table, then staggered closer for a better look.

The head was made of felt and fuzz, with eyes punched through the fabric; blood and bile and other fluids had seeped through the material and dried on the plastic table. Hair was string, yellow for blonde, unravelled and loose, stained with grease. No jaw, just a slash for a mouth, with teeth made from pieces of paper left to curl with age and blacken with sticky fluids. The body was mostly green garden wire, held together with messy clumps of duct tape, stuffed with handfuls of raw meat and mouldy sticks to serve as bones. The hips were a mess, the joints were all wrong, though an attempt had been made to get some kind of articulation for the femurs — made of old broom handles snapped and taped together. For arms the figure had tubes of chicken wire; forks served as hands, gone rusty and corroded. The feet were stubs of wood. The only piece of clothing was a pitiful attempt at sewing a poncho; the colours were all wrong, grey and black.

It wasn't moving. It wasn't even alive, just unconnected inanimate matter.

The Governor walked up beside me.

"It's Lozzie," I murmured. My voice was as muffled as the Governor's, as if the fog and the books had robbed me of the power of speech. I cleared my throat and spoke up. "Or, no. It's your attempt at her, isn't it? This is the Lozzie-thing, the Puppet, the thing you made!"

The Governor stared down at the mess on the table. I tried to read her expression, but there was so little in there, no creases around her eyes, no twitch in the corners of her lips.

"I couldn't get it right," she said. "No matter how hard I tried."

"Get what right?" I demanded. "You tried to create — what, a person? Why?"

The Governor stared and stared and stared, but the Puppet did not move; tides of fog lapped from the open mouths of the nearby library aisles, over-topping the shelves with pale grey-green waves, reaching toward the Lizzie Puppet with tendrils of mist, always fading to nothing before they could touch.

"Why?" The Governor echoed. She finally raised her eyebrows, as if surprised by her own thoughts. "If I created her well enough, then she might see me. She might look back at me. She might help me with the project."

I shook my head. "A person as a mirror?"

The Governor shrugged.

"Why Lizzie?" I pressed.

The Governor's surprise sank back into the foggy placidity of her face. "Somebody gave me a lot of information about her."

"... Alexander Lilburne? Her brother. Yes?"

"I'm not good with names. I have to keep notes. Whoever it was, they gave me a lot of information. I thought that would be enough to create a new one. But it wasn't. It's never enough. No matter how much I gather."

"But then you sent her to bring me back to Wonderland. You sent her to fetch me. Do you not remember that?"

"Only when I realised she couldn't see me."

"Is that all you wanted me for? To see you? To look back at you? Well, here I am! Is this not enough?"

The Governor shrugged, still staring down at the Puppet.

"Why ... why not have Maisie see you, then?" I asked, groping for meaning. "She's been here for ten years. Isn't that enough time to do whatever it is you're trying to do here?"

The Governor finally raised her eyes from the dead matter of the Puppet, but she did not look at me. She stared into the fog-drowned library stacks ahead of us, then off to the left and the right.

"Yes," she said. "But it's not enough to merely collect. The project has to be finished."

I sighed, long and hard and losing my patience.

All of this was a dream, a metaphor, a play made of obsessions and traumas, as much the Eye's as my own. But this fog was so much more frustrating than a simple opponent to scream at or slay. I believe I would have preferred if the Eye's avatar was some cackling, gloating, dark lady villain, straight out of a Saturday morning cartoon, somebody I could hate with ease and fight to the death without a second thought. If only she'd been like Evee's mother, or akin to Horror, or some horrific floating eyeball trailing tendrils like the stingers of a jellyfish.

But instead of catharsis and release, I had this befuddled old doctor, so softly spoken, obsessed only with her private library, without an evil bone in her body.

I flexed my hands — my empty right, and my sweaty left wrapped hard around the plastic handle of my crutch. I tried to imagine my fingers crushing the Governor's windpipe. Could my pain-sapped, morphine-doused, dream-born strength knock the Governor to the floor and bounce her head off the carpet until her skull excavated the concrete beneath? Could I claw at her eyes and pluck out those pinkly glistening orbs? Could I kill her?

Praem — still tucked into the side of my yellow blanket, peeking out to offer her aid — suggested this was a rather counter-productive notion.

I sighed again, this time in total agreement. Toward the figure of the Governor I could muster no real anger, certainly not killing intent. With Evelyn's mother I had been consumed by rage and the need to rescue my beloved friend. If the Governor stood over Maisie and kept her imprisoned, that would have been a different matter, oh yes, then I could have fought. But she simply didn't hold those keys. Rage was pointless.

"Tell me," I said, speaking up to attract the Governor's attention; that didn't work, as she continued to stare off into the fog and the library shelves. "What is all this? All these books, this library."

"Everything," said the Governor.

"Be specific. Is this a Library of Babel situation? Do you have all of reality compressed in here? Or all of Wonderland? Is that what we're looking at?"

"Everything."

I resisted the urge to whack her with my crutch, not wanting to fall onto my backside all over again, and instead swung myself away from the pitiful Lozzie Puppet laid out on the table. I limped over to the little desk next to the door.

The topmost book on the pile of manuscripts was titled 'Reflections of Orange Cut Swift, Volume MMMMDLXXIII.' I flipped it open to one of the bookmarks.

'—the great tower came down all in a hush on the year my fourth daughter died. That was all I recalled in the six months between sunrise and sunset, for I was afflicted most terrible with the grief and the wailing; three of my wings had been broken when I had cast myself from the window of our apartments; scarcely could I drag myself here and about for water and toilet; so that Bites Freely and Upon The Sound Of Rushing Water had to nurse me for the entire period of day. Great shame lay heavily like rocks upon my grief; but then toward the hours of dusk the Priest who I had known as a larva called Not So Wise came to visit and we talked for many hours about what comes after death and what follows is an account of our musings and—'

Up and down that page and onto the next the text went on much the same. I moved the book aside and selected another, titled 'Of The Years Between, Volume 5.'

'—starlight to the left, nebula to the right. Travel. Eight hundred and seventy eight years, three months, seven days, fourteen hours, two seconds. Interstellar hydrogen harvest falling short. Hungry. Swarm maintained coherency. After time, gas giant light reflected from star strong enough for readings. Unsuitable home. Disappointment. Four dead on system exit. Argument resolved. We swing outward again. Next star, 20,000 years distant. Wings folded. Currents exchanged. Course set. Predicted—'

I flicked forward a few times, but the book went on and on like that for well over a thousand pages. I pushed it aside and flipped open a manuscript instead, to a random page. This one was called, 'Memories Of Feeding.'

'—there was blood in my mouth after the act, but it was too much at first, too much to swallow without it spilling out down my cheeks, falling into my belly in waves of gushing gold and green. It had become to me like a seminal fluid, sweet and noxious as life itself; Caratus had been correct, the transformation had changed even my sense of taste and the sensibility of my loins. The man did not struggle in my arms long, for my fangs eventually found his nerves as well as the channels of his blood, and he died before he could shout a warning to the brood-guard before the portal—'

Another — 'The Long Year On The Hills.' Random page.

'—two sheep fell down a crack today. Couldn't get them out with my stick, so I had to fetch some rope, which meant a trip into town, which meant I saw the old woman outside the florist again. The flowers had mated and the result was all a-terrible screaming—'

Another.

'—seven is not a magic number and this I refute before council and queendom, on pain of being food for our most blessed queen so to for fill her stomach with enough meat for a thousand eggs laid—'

Another.

'—the trees were all dead after the eruption but the land was clean and ready for the next stage of the process—'

Another and another and another, on and on and on. I flipped open more manuscripts, but they were much the same — endless stories of all kinds, some dramatic or horrific or human, but many so obviously alien, written for alien audiences by alien minds. Had the dream compressed these down into a human form, an interpreted version of whatever texts these had originally been? Were these books from Outside, translated into English?

The Governor paid me no attention, still staring off into the fog.

"What are these?" I called out to her, holding up one of the bound manuscripts. She finally looked around. I waved the manuscript, this one titled 'Break Down In The Sump Where I Died Of Starvation

And Thirst And Exposure'. I had wisely declined to read any of that one; far too grim for our current circumstances.

The Governor stared at the manuscript in my hand, then said: "Everything."

I pursed my lips. "You are supremely unhelpful. Did you know that?"

"No." The Governor shook her head. If she was offended by my rebuke, she didn't show it.

I sighed and slapped the manuscript back down on the table. "I don't understand. What is this, a collection of books you've acquired from Outside? A catalogue of meaningless drivel? And what about that?" I gestured at the blackboard. "What is that equation for? What does it do?"

"That is the expression of the project. You can finish it."

"And what is the project?"

"To read it all."

My turn to shake my head. "I don't understand. I don't understand what any of this means. What is this room? What are all these books? What is this?"

The Governor turned away again, staring off into the fog which rolled and pillowed between the library stacks; for a moment I thought I'd lost her attention, and that I would have to walk over and poke her in the side before I could get any sense out of her.

But then she raised a hand and pointed ahead, into the row of shelves directly opposite the door.

"I'll show you," she said. "Then you can see."

Without so much as a backward glance, the Governor strode off between the shelves, instantly welcomed and swallowed by a thousand tongues of fog.

"H-hey!" I squeaked. "Wait, wait for me!"

I hurried to join her. At the threshold of the shelves I paused, where the fog seemed to thicken and tug, fingers of mist plucking at the edges of my yellow blanket and tracing the bulge of my bandaged leg, wrapping empty fingers around the base of my crutch and cupping Praem's plush chin.

The Governor was receding into the distance, an indistinct figure sinking into the still and silent murk.

Praem pointed out that once again, I did not have any other choice, and I did not want to get left behind without my guide in these strange and dreamlike depths.

I plunged ahead, clutching hard to my crutch, trying to ignore the mounting throb deep down inside my left shin.

Unlike every previous time I had hurried after the Governor, she quickly got away from me; the tail of her white lab coat vanished into the fog ahead, her booted footsteps swallowed up by the murk, her dark blonde hair turning pale, then translucent, then gone.

"Wait!" I croaked. "Wait— wait for me! Wait!"

Within moments, I was alone in a deep cistern funnel filled with fog and shelves and books.

"Dammit," I hissed. "What now?"

Praem suggested I carry on; perhaps I would find what the Governor wanted me to see. I agreed, if only because there was nothing else to choose.

The tip of my crutch caught steady and secure against the rough carpet of the library. My leg ached with a subtle pulse of pain, but after a few steps the sensation became routine, easily dismissed, as if the pain was being leached away by the tendrils of fog. My pace was slow but steady, passing by the towering shelves set in their rails, with their well-oiled handles and their grey plastic faces.

Each set of shelves had a label on the end which faced into the aisle. Some were printed, others stamped; a few were hand-written, similar to the labels on the monitors upstairs. Was this the Governor's own penmanship?

Most of the labels were completely incomprehensible — alien names, date formats from impossible times, subject areas which sounded like riddles — but as I progressed down the empty aisle between the rows, I began to notice a pattern. The library was organised not by category, that was merely an illusion caused by the sheer number of texts; the shelves were descending in alphabetical order, though we had entered somewhere around the letter 'J'.

A sinking feeling settled into the pit of my stomach.

"No," I hissed. "No, it's not possible."

It is, Praem said.

"Easy for you to say," I whispered into the fog. "I ... I would rather not know ..."

But I could only push on.

Doing so was easier thought than performed. I limped deeper into the fog for what felt like hours, reading the esoteric and occult labels on the end-caps of the shelves, and peering into an occasional open row, at thousands of books wedged tight in their places. The ache in my leg got worse and worse; how long had it been since my last dose of morphine? Praem said not yet four hours. I must wait. I must be sensible. So I waited and I walked, hobbling onward, lurching, staggering, past the end of 'J' and through the wilds of 'K' and 'L', until I finally reached the outskirts of 'M'.

By then my suspicions were worse than the pain. My heart was in my throat, a fist in my guts. A few minutes later I stopped next to a row of shelves with a very familiar name written on the end — handwritten by the avatar of the Eye herself.

'Morell, Heather.'

A dozen rolling shelves all bore of my name. And after those dozen came another, almost swallowed by the lapping edges of the cold and clammy fog — 'Morell, Maisie.'

I clung to my crutch like driftwood in the sea, dwarfed by the grey plastic shelves like the shores of some vast and undiscovered continent, peering into the first open row labelled with my own name. I wanted to be sick. I wanted to shut my eyes. I wanted to run away.

"Praem," I hissed. "What is this?"

We better have a look, Praem advised.

"But what ..."

Praem did not know.

I crept into the row, slinking beneath the shadow of the bookshelf. The plain plastic shelves themselves were stuffed with loose-leaf manuscripts, hardback tomes, spiral-bound notebooks, and laminated cards. A few of the hardbacks boasted actual titles, ones I recognised — there was Watership Down, and there was The Hobbit. I pulled both of those off the shelves and checked their contents; they seemed normal enough, matching the stories I knew so well. Here too was a collected works of Shakespeare, with Hamlet and Lear in their proper places.

But the hardbacks were in the minority. None of the other entities had titles, only catalogue numbers printed on the spines or on little sticky labels stuck to the covers. There were hundreds of roughly bound manuscripts on one shelf alone, and six shelves to each row, and a dozen rolling shelves in total. Too many.

I walked deep inside, where the shadows were heaviest and the fog the darkest.

There I found the text marked ‘M.H.1.1.’

Shaking hands drew it forth, feeling nothing like my own. Praem told me I was going to be okay. I balanced the manuscript on one arm and opened the first page.

‘On the day I met Raine, the first thing I did was jerk awake in bed and vomit nightmares into my lap.’

Eyeballs blossomed in my brain, peering and searching; fingers scratched and groped at the inside of my skull.

I slapped the manuscript shut, gasping for breath, choking back a wave of vomit. “What ... what ... what is this ... oh, oh, no, no no, that’s ... me? I—”

I grabbed another bound manuscript from further down and yanked it off the shelves, then let it fall open at random.

‘Of course, that wasn’t how it happened at all. There was no lightless abyss, no hole and no wall, no voice to whisper and no ears to hear. We didn’t use words, we used mathematics. We spoke in the language of atomic force and gravity, of starshine and photons, but I can’t tell you about that. I can’t even tell myself about that.’

I dropped that manuscript and grabbed a third.

‘I’d grown used to Evee’s anger by then. I thought I understood it, that I understood her, at least better than I had back when we'd first met. Before we'd become real friends — and then perhaps more — I'd found Evelyn's anger intimidating at best, actively frightening at worst. Short-tempered, bitter, acerbic, often directly insulting, sometimes accompanied by threats of physical violence, omni-directional, not even sparing herself from her own ire, it was easy to see Evelyn Saye as the 'nasty bitch' she so often tried to project. But I'd come to understand that Evee wore her temper like a suit of armour.'

I threw that one at the shelves and staggered back, breath ripping through my throat, on the verge of hyperventilating.

Eyes, eyes inside my brain, looking down into my soul; hands and fingers and all scrabbling about against the limits of my skull. I clawed at my own forehead, heaving for breath, as if I could pull the sensation out of me.

Praem told me to take a moment and breathe — but I could not. I lurched upright and staggered out of the row, back into the central aisle, fog clutching at my ankles and whirling past my shoulders. I limped down to the furthest of the shelves labelled with my name, then plunged back into the stacks, looking for where it all ended.

I grabbed one of the last manuscripts — 'M.H.24.1.' My fingers shook so hard I could barely peel back the pages.

'My eyes snapped open, deep in dreary dread-drenched dark, in a place I did not know.'

I jerked upright, clawing at my racing heart, clutching scratchy bedsheets to my heaving chest. My breath came in ragged gasps. My skin was coated in cold sweat, gluing my pajamas to my clammy back and belly. Rusty bedsprings creaked beneath my slender shifting weight.'

That was me, when I had arrived in Cygnet Asylum; I felt those clawing fingers scraping at the inside of my skull again as if trying to scratch me clean, eyes blossoming in my own grey matter and peering into my deeps. I tossed that manuscript aside and grabbed the next, then the next, then the next, then—

'That was me, when I had arrived in Cygnet Asylum; I felt those clawing fingers scraping at the inside of my skull again as if trying to scratch me clean, eyes blossoming in my own grey matter and peering into my deeps. I tossed that manuscript aside and grabbed the next, then the next, then the next, then the next, until I found the very last. I stood

bedlam boundary – 24.26

The Governor and myself — the Eye and I — stood surrounded on all sides by the aisles of the archives, wrapped deep in the papery embroidery of her mind, embraced by the whorls and coils of clammy, clutching, claustrophobic fog, the folds and frills of her brain.

She — the Eye's avatar, the Eye's ego, the Eye's representative upon the stage of this play — loomed at the end of the row, flanked by grey plastic and tight-packed ranks of books. Fingers of fog plucked and pulled at the shoulders of her laboratory coat, trying to drag her back into the maze of the stacks, to drown her in the weight and heft of her own thoughts. Pink eyes burned like tiny toxic fires in the shadow of her face. Blonde hair the colour of old straw hung in an uncombed mass down her back. Her hands were shoved firmly into her pockets, with the head of Horror the Nurse nowhere to be seen.

The Governor had appeared like an apparition, thrown from the churning waves of fog to shock me senseless with this final revelation. But her expression was placid, passive, plain disinterest. To her, this was no shock at all.

"This is ... this is everything you've ever observed?" I repeated her words, my voice shaking. "This library, the archives. This is everything you've ever observed?"

The Governor nodded once, then looked away, her eyes wandering across the bound volumes on the opposite shelves. "Mm," she grunted an affirmative. "Everything."

"All the people and universes and dimensions you dragged into Wonderland, or which fell into your orbit? This is all those, everything you've ever seen?"

"Everything," she echoed.

My heart still raced like a dying dove; my crawling skin was coated with cold sweat; my stomach threatened rebellion, roiling and rocking, rejecting that awful feeling of eyeballs blossoming inside my brain and sharp-nailed fingers groping against the underside of my skull.

But the feeling had faded. The revelation was over.

Now there was simply her and I, alone in the fog.

I felt like my mind would fly apart under the pressure, as if my skull was stuffed with an ocean, straining against the delicate bones of my cranium. This — all this, not just the books which had catalogued the inside of my mind, but all of it, all the tales under alien names, all the records and reminiscences, all the billions of volumes of stories, on and on and on, from all manner of Outside dimensions and Outsider minds, every last word — it was the inside of the Eye's head, the sum of her observations of everything she had ever seen, every being and world and mote that she had pulled into her orbit, into Wonderland, knowingly or by accident or otherwise.

The dream, the play, the metaphor-made-flesh, had rendered all that raw observation down into a library, peopled it with books, and filled those tomes with words, with stories, all of them in — hilariously or stupidly or bizarrely — British English, my own idiom and vernacular and dialect.

I didn't know if I should laugh or scream. The absurdity was too much. All these books, all this text, all this—

Metaphor, Praem reminded me firmly, still tucked into the front of my yellow blanket. Metaphor. Not real. These books represented the Eye's mind. They were signifier alone, not that which is signified.

“And this ... this is ... ” I panted, still unable to gather myself. “This is your ‘project’? To read ... ” I cast my right arm upward and away, indicating the totality of her archives. “All of this?”

The Governor still did not look at me. “Yes. Then the project will be complete.”

A hysterical hiccup-laugh slipped from between my lips. Praem said something sane and sensible, some attempt to grip my arms and steady my heart, but I wasn't listening.

“That's madness!” I said. “That's complete madness. Don't you understand? This— this— this place, this archive, this library, yes, it's a metaphor, fine. I get that! But you're a metaphor, too! And you're just one person. For one person to read all of this would take more than a lifetime! Ten lifetimes! Let alone to actually understand and process it, to internalise or comprehend even a fraction of it. If this is a metaphor for everything you've ever observed, then ... then your project is impossible. You can't read all of this."

"I can. I will. There will be an end. And then I will be."

I laughed again, harsher this time, uncaring of how I sounded. I jabbed a finger at the bound manuscript I'd hurled to the floor — the hateful thing which had groped and scratched inside my head.

"Have you even read that?" I said. "How can you? It's still being written! You and I, standing here, even this conversation we're having, it's all been recorded right now! You've set yourself a metaphysically impossible task. Don't you understand? Look!" Still she would not look. "Look at the book! Look at me!"

The Governor finally lowered her pink-froth eyes. She stared at the manuscript on the floor for far too long, so that I thought she had been paralysed by the point I had made. But then she dragged her eyes across the books on the shelf, across the volumes of me, my life, my experiences, my everything.

She blinked several times, then frowned with the tiniest hint of melancholy.

"I need to get around to these," she said.

White hot anger surged up from my heart, boiling and bubbling into my throat with such force that it took me unawares; Praem suggested that I try to keep my temper, that furious words would avail me nothing. But my mouth was already opening, my vision stained red, my chest and hands trembling.

Violation. Every scrap of who and what I was, laid out on these pages. And she hadn't even read them!

She wasn't even paying attention now; the Governor was already turning aside and looking away, angling her eyes out into the fog, toward the other shelves, the other stacks, the other stories.

"So much to get around to," she said. "Now you see. You see now. You see—"

"You haven't even read them!" I shouted. "What was the point of all this?! All this violence and violation! You, inside my head for ten years, and you haven't even read it!?"

The Governor looked back at me. She seemed surprised and confused, her wide pink eyes glowing with soft inner fire.

“You haven’t even read it,” I repeated, throat full of bile. “You—”

“Volume twenty two point four,” the Governor said, and pointed at one of the bound manuscripts on the self. “Word eight thousand seven hundred and sixteen to word eight thousand seven hundred and twenty six: My tentacle touched the black surface of the lightless blade.” Her hand moved to point at another volume. “Twenty one point ten, word three thousand two hundred and eighty to word three thousand two hundred and eighty six. I blinked at him in surprise.” A third point, a third random volume. “Twenty point eight, word six thousand and forty one to word six thousand and fifty: A rectangle of darkness, untouched by the heat-haze sunlight.” Her hand flicked again. “Volume—”

“Stop, stop!” I snapped. “Stop!”

The Governor’s gaze wandered away again. “Check them.”

“ ... pardon?”

“Check them. If you do not believe.”

I glanced at the bound volumes on the shelves, the ones the Governor had indicated, but I didn’t need to open them and flick through the pages. I knew those words, those feelings, those sensations; they crawled inside my own head, threatening to peel open the lids of the eyes that had only just subsided into the meat of my brain. Those were my own thoughts, put down on paper — not only read by the Governor, but memorised.

My anger went cold and ashen on my tongue; I’d gotten her wrong.

“You ... you have read these?” I said. “Then what do you mean by saying you need to get around to them?”

The Governor shrugged. She began to turn away from me again, back out into the empty central aisle between the rows of shelves. “I don’t understand it all. Not yet. Have to keep reading.”

“Wait!” I cried. “Wait, please. Don’t just run off again. Don’t you dare. Please, just wait, wait there!”

To my great surprise, the Governor did as I asked. She paused just beyond the end of the aisle. Fog lapped about her boots and shins like the shallows of a grey and sucking sea; little wavelets of translucent mist tugged at the hem of her lab coat, eager to pull her back into the ocean of memory.

I staggered forward on my crutch and awkwardly crouched down to pick up the volume I had cast onto the floor — the volume which had contained my own current thoughts, my own recursive actions. I handled it carefully, not wishing to see the pages inside once again; the experience might trap me in some kind of loop, an eternal reader unable to pull away from the page. But I lifted it with care and returned it to the right place on the shelves.

Then I turned away and staggered down the row, lurching on my crutch, bursting out from between the rolling stacks. I rejoined the Governor in the stagnant canal of the central aisle, choked both ahead and behind by endless depths of greyish fog.

The Governor glanced down at me, hands in her pockets, her expressionless face so far away.

“You ... ” I said, wetting my lips, knowing I had to make this next step or be paralysed. “Wait right there. Don’t move, don’t wander off again. Stay right there. Promise me.”

“Promise?”

“Promise me!”

“I’ll stay. I promise.”

I turned away from the Governor and looked down the row of rolling stacks, toward the neighbours to those with my name upon them.

‘Morell, Maisie.’ Lapped by fog, written by hand, awaiting a reader.

The first and last of those rolling stacks were moved aside, wide open for instant access. I need only take a dozen steps, and there I would be among my twin sister’s thoughts.

But that was the lure, wasn’t it? That was the very same seductive power which had held the Eye in stasis and observation for a subjective eternity. To prepare endlessly for the taking of action while never making that first real step. To read about others without taking the leap into real contact. What would Maisie’s thoughts avail me now? What would I find in those volumes? Nothing but tears and misery and horror; I knew full well the indignity and isolation of her cell, I did not need to read about it. All I needed was to focus on the revolution, the jailbreak, the rescue.

Reading would not help Maisie now. I had to act.

With great difficulty I tore my eyes away from my twin's name. I had to focus on the Governor, on winning her allegiance, with what little persuasive power I had mustered.

I turned back to her, but I pointed at Maisie's shelves. "What will I see, if I read those?"

The Governor followed my finger. Her eyes threatened to wander away again, off into the fog beyond the shelves, but then she pulled her focus back, staring at the grey plastic, at Maisie's handwritten name.

"Not much," the Governor said, shaking her head. "Repetition, mostly. She is hard to understand."

I sighed, not sure if I could ever laugh at that irony. "Yes, that might be because she's trapped inside a gigantic tank of water. Do you understand how that might have something to do with it?"

The Governor shook her head. Her eyes wandered left and right, then finally alighted back on me, flitting about my form like a pair of pink-winged skittish moths.

"Do you hate me?" she said.

"You asked me that same question earlier," I replied. "And I already told you. No, I don't, because there's no point."

The Governor's eyes floated away upon the fog, off between the stacks. "That doesn't mean you don't."

"Why do you even care?" I asked. "I'm not your real daughter, I'm just—"

"I have to return to the project," she murmured. "I have to get back to work. Back to reading."

"No!" I snapped. "No, you don't! I just tried to explain, the project is impossible to complete, it's madness, a mirage you can never reach, you—"

The Governor took a step back, half-turning away. "I have to—"

“Stop running away! Stop looking away! You say I’m your daughter, well pay attention to me! Look at me! Look at me, damn you!”

The Governor paused in her retreat. Her eyes flitted back again.

“You’ve read all those books about me, all those volumes which catalogue the inside of my head. Is that correct?” I asked. “And you’ve got it all memorised, haven’t you?”

“Yes.”

“Then tell me, what do you know about me?”

The Governor blinked. “What?”

“What do you know about me? Say the words, say it all out loud. Start with the basics. What do you know about me?”

The Governor said, “Heather Lavinia Morell. One hundred and two pounds. Five feet and one eighth of an inch. Sixty five percent oxygen. Eighteen point five percent carbon. Nine point five percent hydrogen. Two point six—”

“Oh my goodness,” I interrupted her so softly, barely louder than a whisper, but she halted for me all the same. “You ... you can’t actually see me, can you?”

“What?”

“How many hairs are on my head?”

The Governor answered instantly: “One hundred and fifteen thousand eight hundred and—”

“What did I have for breakfast on February first, last year?”

“Toast, two pieces. Butter. Jam—”

“How do I feel about you?”

The Governor stopped.

“How do I feel about Raine?”

No reply.

“Why am I trying to rescue Maisie?”

Nothing.

I shook my head. “You’ve got all those details, but you can’t really see me. You can't really see people, you never could. Whenever you would look at things — people, houses, the whole of Wonderland, whatever — your vision rendered it down into components. Into atoms. Subatomic particles. You burned up and destroyed anything and everything you looked at, but you never saw the whole. You don't know anything about me. You have a whole ... story!" I gestured at the row of shelves with my name upon each one. "You have this whole story about me, and yet you can't tell me anything about myself?"

The Governor stared, and — to my incredible surprise, beyond words — her pink-soft eyes of sunrise in rain filled with a sheen of tears.

The rest of her face did not change. The corners of her eyes did not crease. Her throat did not bob. Her lips did not crinkle with sadness or turn down at the edges with parental melancholy.

She just said: "I'm sorry. I don't know how. That's why I have to finish the project. Then I'll understand. Then I'll get it. Then I'll know."

I shook my head. "No, you won't. That's not real understanding. It's not! If you've read all this stuff about me and you still don't understand me, then reading more isn't going to help!"

"Do you hate me?"

"I've told you, no, I—"

The Governor started to step away again. "I need to return to the project. If you can't help, I'll keep going, I'll keep going. I'll keep going. I'll keep—"

I reached out and grabbed the Governor's arm. She froze, staring off into the fog and the stacks, into her infinite project, her never-ending library of everything she'd ever seen. Glorious and infinite and utterly useless to the task of true insight.

We stayed there for a long moment. My thoughts were like acid in my throat, but eventually I forced them out.

"You are a giant, sky-filling eyeball," I said. "The size of a planet. Bigger, even. You are abyssal logic written on reality by the force of your own will. And by accident or otherwise, I've condensed you down into this human container. Or at least whatever part of you which might be pressed to communicate. And this, this is the inside of your mind. You've let me in. And thank you for doing that. Because that's the point, you see? That's the point of all this — this asylum, this horror, this bubble-reality I've created. That is the whole point. You and me, alone in a room, finally talking, not just you reading books by yourself, 'observing' alone. So no, I am not going to let you wander back off into the project. The project doesn't work. The project has failed. The project is over."

The Governor relaxed; I knew she would not run, though she still did not look at me. I let go of her arm.

"You've done so much damage to me," I said, thinking out loud. "Much more than my biological mother ever did. But she had no excuse, she was a person from the beginning, she could have listened to me, her daughter. She could have made other choices. She could have done things differently. But you? You're not a person, or you weren't, at least. You're pure observation, a principle made into living matter. I don't even think you understand what you've done to me — or to Maisie — until right now perhaps, this very second, until I put you in this compressed form. You didn't intend to do this, did you? You just ... you just looked, and saw, and kept trying to see."

The Governor finally looked at me again. Her tears were gone.

"And you're still keeping Maisie confined," I said. "You still have her locked up. I should hate you for that, yes. But I don't think that's fruitful, because you understood not one bit of this. Did you?"

"I'm trying," the Governor said. "I have to keep going. I have to complete the project."

I sighed. I had gained a sliver of understanding of the Eye, and begun the process of communication, but this was like talking to a brick wall — or perhaps to an addict, so focused on her addiction that I could not peel her away, could not make her see in any other fashion, could not make her understand that this was not necessary.

"I cannot believe I am standing here having a conversation with you," I said. "You have been the monster in my nightmares for half my life. You took my sister. You're a giant eyeball in the sky, and I'm just talking to you. I ... I think I'm trying to save you. Why am I trying to save you? You almost destroyed me. You're right, I should hate you, but I don't."

The Governor said nothing.

I sighed again, heavy this time, exhausted inside. "The old me would have been a gibbering ball on the floor by now. Do you even understand that?"

"No," she said.

"Fair enough." I tried a different track: "What if you stopped the project?"

The Governor looked back down at me, pink eyes widened a fraction. "Stop?"

"Stop the project, yes." I gestured about with my eyes, at the library stacks marching off, swallowed up by the still and silent fog. My crutch creaked beneath my left arm. My weight was starting to bother me. My leg ached like a distant drum. "Stop trying to read all of this. Give up. Abandon it. Move on."

The Governor took a series of short, sharp breaths. I realised with my own wide-eyed surprise that she was terrified of that notion.

"Are you afraid?" I asked, stunned. "What are you afraid of?"

"I don't want that," she said. "I'd rather die than go back to that."

"Go back to what?"

"Before."

I bit down on my patience; she really was trying her best. "Before what?"

"Before I was ... before ... when I was ... was ... "

She frowned as she stumbled over her words. Whatever it was, she could not voice the concept.

And suddenly, I knew another thing we had in common.

"Before you emerged from the abyss?" I said.

The Governor turned to me and locked eyes.

Suddenly she was all there. Absolutely lucid, totally present, just like that moment back in the infirmary. Those pinkish eyes were torn wide and trembling with something I knew so well, so intimately, so painfully. Her stare was like the grasp of a drowning girl, clinging to me with her sight, threatening to rip me beneath the waves with her desperation. I almost recoiled, clutching hard to my crutch like driftwood in a storm, but I restrained my reaction. I had to stand my ground, I had to push.

“I know you came from the abyss,” I said. “I deduced it, a long time ago now. You pulled yourself upward until you were large enough to burst out into reality. A reality, at least. That was Wonderland, before you burned it to a crisp.”

“Yes,” she said in a halting murmur.

“And that’s the before, the before you don’t want to go back to?”

“Yes.”

“... what was it like? Why don’t you want to—”

“I was blind.”

I wet my lips, struggling to imagine, but then the Governor carried on without prompting.

“I don’t want to be blind again,” she said, staring at me so hard I thought my skin might begin to cook as if beneath the midday sun. “I don’t want to go back to that. I would rather be dead. I want to be the way I’m supposed to be.”

I nodded slowly. “We really are like each other, aren’t we? I found my true self in the abyss and I’ve been modifying my flesh ever since, trying to get back to that feeling. But you, you’re coming at the same thing from the opposite angle. For you, reality is where you can become yourself. Is that right?”

“Yes.”

“What do you want to be?”

“Complete.”

I sighed, hoping that the human metaphor was making sense. “Nobody is ever ‘complete’. Except in death, I suppose. Nobody ever stops changing or growing, even if that happens in directions they might not like. But you’re not going to stop being you just because you stop reading all these books. I don’t understand the connection.”

“The archives are the only way to understand,” said the Governor.

“Without them I don’t know anything.”

“To understand what, though?”

“Myself?”

She phrased the word as a question, and as she did, her focused stare collapsed. Her wide-struck eyes returned to normal. Her gaze wandered away, across my shoulders, out into the fog, over to the shelves — then down to her own hands, removed from her pockets. She flexed her fingers, staring at the motion of flesh and bone.

“Introspection?” I asked. “You’re trying to comprehend yourself?” I shook my head. “But you can’t, not like this.” I gestured outward. “Where are you?”

The Governor glanced up at me. “What?”

“Where are you?” I repeated. “In this library, in the archive. All the stacks are labelled and sorted with names and subjects. Where’s your story? Where are you?”

“I am the sum. I will be the sum, once the project is complete.”

I almost laughed. “You can’t grow just by reading books. I mean, seriously, I’ve learned that from my own life! You can learn a lot of things from books, and they can be beautiful, or powerful, or move you, or do all sorts of things to you. But for growth, for identity, you need context as well. You need other people. Reference points. Here, does Raine have a set of shelves in here too? Have you been observing her? Surely you picked that up from her, right? People need anchors.”

The Governor shook her head.

“You’re a singular, unique, isolated being, with no social context,” I said, talking more to myself than to her. “And you’re trying to build an identity by reading books, but that’s a metaphor, isn’t it? This metaphor is the only way to communicate with you. Your cognitive process would be incomprehensible otherwise. You’re trying to build an understanding of yourself by watching everything else. Observing, but not participating. Never being part of something. You’re like a little girl growing up on a desert island, with only books for company.”

“But everything is here,” she said. “The archives are everything. Everything is in the archives. If only I read it all, then I can—”

“You need something other than books. Something that isn’t other people’s experiences. You need your own anchor.”

The Governor seemed paralysed. “What else ... what is ... what is there?”

The obvious solution was almost too obscene to draw, but draw it I did.

“Me,” I said. “I’m right here in front of you. You don’t need all these books about me and Maisie to understand us. We can just talk, like we are now, without you blasting me to atoms and rendering me down to ash and grease. Look at me. Really look at me.”

The Governor looked — she did, she tried, I saw the effort in her face. But all she saw was atoms and parts, the angles of my face, the set of my limbs, the number of hairs on my head. ‘I’ was beyond her.

Her pinkish eyes filled with a sheen of tears once again.

“I tried before,” she said. “I tried to understand you. But I couldn’t.”

“Was that what all the hyperdimensional mathematics was about?” I asked. “The lessons, the teaching, the nightmares?”

“I thought I could understand you if you could tell me about yourself in a way I could understand.”

I blinked in surprise, then almost laughed. “Well, you weren’t wrong, were you?”

“What?” The Governor’s tears vanished.

“We’re talking now, in a way you can understand, via hyperdimensional mathematics. Well done. If you had never taught me, we couldn’t have this conversation. In a very long-winded and roundabout way, your plan worked. Here I am.”

The Governor blinked — once, hard, screwing her eyes shut.

When she opened them again, she stared directly at me.

We held each other’s gaze for thirty seconds, then a minute, then longer. Not once did she look away. Her eyes had ceased to wander. My left shin began to ache, a warning that the morphine was beginning to wear thin within my blood, but I dared not shift my weight or look away, for the Eye finally saw.

“Yes?” I prompted.

“ ... hello,” said the Governor.

“Hello,” I echoed. “Hello there. Hi. I’m Heather, but you know that already. And I’m not a book. You see me now, don’t you?”

“I see you.”

“Good. Um. I’m not sure how you did that, but good, well done.”

Her stare was a little too intense, a little too wide-eyed, but I wasn’t about to start complaining.

“What now?” she said, still staring.

“Well, if you want to understand yourself, you do need context, other people, mirrors in which to see yourself reflected, yes. I think I can serve as that for you, if you’re just ... looking at me. But you also need to think about yourself directly. That’s why I asked if there’s a book about you in here. You need to ... um ... ” I sighed, almost cringing at the metaphysical pun as the words came to me. “You need to look inward. Can you do that?”

The Governor seemed absolutely lost. Her lips hung parted. Her hands were held before her as if in prelude to a hopeless prayer.

Praem suggested I start for her, at the very beginning.

“What’s your name?” I asked.

“ ... my name?”

“Yes, your name. You’re part of the Eye, okay, but ‘The Eye’ is not a name, not really. I’ve been just thinking of you as ‘the Governor’ this entire time, but that’s not a name either, that’s a title, a role, like in a play. Raine called you ‘Eileen’, which I’m not going to grace with serious consideration. I’ve heard other people call you the ‘Magnus Viglator’. Zheng called you some old Chinese word which I think means ‘lord’, but that doesn’t seem right for you. I think Evelyn spoke your ‘true name’ once, and it made everyone’s ears hurt, but I doubt that’s something you chose. I suspect that’s just some magical terminology that somebody else made up, some mage making assumptions. You had no parents to give you a name, so you probably named yourself. So, what’s your name?”

“I don’t know.”

“You don’t have a name? Or you forgot it? Or it was taken away?”

“I don’t know.” The Governor stared hard. Her pinkly glowing eyes seemed to expand and expand, as if trying to suck me down into a void. “Nobody has ever had to refer to me before. Nobody has had need to speak a name.”

I did my best to smile — awkward and horrified and deep in the fog of an alien mind, having a sensible and reasonable and polite conversation with the very thing which had turned my life into a tortured mess for the last decade. And rather than turning my stomach with disgust and anger and rejection, I began to feel mostly pity.

She was almost like a child.

“Well, I do,” I said. “I need a name with which to refer to you. If only to stop you wandering off the next time you decide to plunge into the fog and leave me behind.”

“You,” said the Governor.

“Me?”

“No. You.”

“ ... I’m sorry, pardon? What are you trying to say?”

“You,” the Governor repeated. “You can just call me ‘you’.”

I narrowly resisted an urge to put my face in my hand. “That’s not a name, that’s a second-person pronoun. It’s not specific to you.”

“Yes it is. You say you, and obviously it is me.”

I paused, squinting my eyes, trying to unknot this linguistic absurdity. “Do you think you’re the only entity with subjectivity? Do you think you’re the only person anybody could possibly be referring to when they say ‘you’?”

The Governor — You? — paused again, bewildered. “I have never thought about this before.”

“Yes, that sounds about right.” I tutted softly. “I suppose I could call you ‘Yuu’. That’s short for several Japanese names, like Yukari, or Yuuka. Though I suspect that would give Evelyn an aneurysm. I don’t know enough about anime not to name you after somebody wildly inappropriate. Besides, it hardly solves the linguistic issue.

And the linguistic issue is just a symptom of a metaphysical issue.” I sighed and stared back into the Governor’s focused eyes. “I don’t even know where to start with this.”

Praem offered a suggestion — herself.

“Ah! Good idea, thank you, Praem,” I said, and pulled the Praem Plushie out from the front of my yellow robe.

The Governor watched with a curious expression as I held up Praem. I pointed her flat-eyed, expressionless face of felt and fabric toward the Governor.

“Hello?” said the Governor. “Hello.”

“Oh, um, well done,” I said. “I was about to tell you to say that. This is Praem. She’s my ... spiritual daughter? Daughter-in-law? Family maid-by-choice? Whichever, she’s part of my family, that’s all you really need to know.”

Praem returned the greeting.

“Do you see?” I asked. “When I say ‘you’, I might be referring to you, or I might be referring to Praem.” I turned Praem so I could meet her flat eyes. “Hello Praem, how are you?”

Praem replied that she was well, thank you.

“See?” I asked the Governor. “To me, you are ‘you’, but Praem is also ‘you’, because neither of you are me. Do you follow?”

The Governor’s face collapsed into the strongest and starkest expression from her thus far — the most cavernous, craggiest, and confused frown I had ever seen on a human visage, coupled with the wide eyes of bewildered revelation.

She looked at Praem, then looked at me, then back at Praem, then back at me. Then down at her own hands. Then upward, at nothing.

“Ah,” she said.

I sighed with relief. “Okay, there you go! So, you need a proper name, you see? Because you’re not just ‘you’. You’re you. So, who are you?”

“I don’t know.” She looked at me again. “Can you give me a name?”

“I’m not sure about that,” I said with a wince. “Are you certain you didn't have one before?"

"Heather," said the Governor.

"Yes, that's my name. But—"

"I could be Heather. It's a name."

I sighed again. "No, no, that's not what you should do. You didn't choose that, you just picked the thing that's right in front of you. And it would be incredibly weird and confusing if we were both named 'Heather'." I gestured left and right with Praem, at the library stacks and grey plastic shelves peeking through the veils of fog and shifting deeps of greasy mist. "You have this whole library of experiences, all these lives, compressed down into text. Why not pick a name from among these? You must have plenty from which to choose."

The Governor followed the directions I indicated with Praem, but then snapped back to me. Her eyes clung to me like desperate hands, clawing at the surface, trying to resist the pull of the ocean beneath.

"I don't know how to pick," she said. "Please, give me a name?"

"I ... I can't do that, not yet. I don't know who you are. I don't know enough about you. I don't know what you're like, or what you value, or what you care about, other than observing things, but we're trying to move past that. If I knew a bit more, perhaps I could pick a suitable name, though it would be better for you to name yourself, I think."

"Eileen?"

I winced again, much worse. "Let's not entertain that possibility. Look, the whole point of asking you for a name was to facilitate you looking inward, to define who and what you are. The name is just a container for that stuff. What's important is the material being contained and summarised. The signified, not the signifier. The signifier can be nice, or cute, or fun, or whatever. So ... "

"Who am I?" she finished the sentence, when I could not.

"Exactly. Who are you?"

The Governor looked left and right, then over her shoulder, down into the murk of the fog. "I'm all of this."

“No,” I said. “You’re more than that. We’re all more than the sum of the things we’ve read and the experiences we’ve watched other people have. What are your experiences? Who are you?”

The Governor’s face swung back around. She stared at me, bewildered and empty.

Praem suggested I keep dragging her. Don’t give up now.

“You started in the abyss, correct?” I asked.

“Yes.”

“And ... did you have a twin down there? Is that what you’ve been missing this whole time?”

“No.”

I frowned. “Then why study myself and Maisie? Why the obsession with twins, with pairs, with—”

“Because I am incomplete. Because the archive is incompletely read. I need to look into a mirror. I wanted to understand you, because you looked a little bit like me, but whole. You had a mirror.”

“A twin, right.” But then I sighed. “This isn’t helping either of us. I’m not sure what you need, but I absolutely need to sit down before my left leg falls off. Are you certain there’s no entries in this library about you? No shelves with you in them? Reflections on yourself? Anything like that?”

The Governor shook her head. “None. I am sure.”

Praem made the obvious suggestion; I reached the same conclusion at the very same second.

“Well,” I said. “Can we write a book about you?”

“What?”

I smiled, feeling like I was finally getting somewhere. “A book about you. An entry full of your thoughts and feelings, your memories, your experiences. Do you have any blank books around here? There were some empty notebooks and papers up in your office, but I doubt those count, metaphysically speaking.”

“Blank ... books?” The Governor frowned with incredible confusion once again. “Why would a book be blank?”

“So you can fill it with words. Do you have any?”

The Governor shook her head. “The archive is for reading.”

“Well, you and I are going to work together, and add a new book to it.” I cast about, peering off into the fog. “Here, there must be something we can write on, like ... oh! Wait here a second. Don’t run off, okay?”

I tucked Praem back into the front of my yellow blanket, then staggered the few paces over to the open mouth of the library stacks, to the nearest row with my name upon it. I did not step all the way inside, but only reached in and grabbed one of the spiral-bound manuscripts, the chunkiest one I could find.

I pulled it out and turned it to the plastic front cover. A little pink label was affixed down in the corner — ‘M.H.24.27’.

Was this dangerous?

Praem said no, this was not dangerous. This book was not the inside of my mind; these were not my actual words. These were the Eye’s observations of me, boiled down into English text by the vastly powerful metaphorisation process of hyperdimensional mathematics. This would no more harm me than shredding a print out of one of my essays for university would hurt my own physical brain.

Still, I braced myself for the worst, like holding a gun to my own foot.

I used the corner of a fingernail to pick at the little label. It came up easily, then peeled away, and left behind no hint of sticky residue.

Nothing happened. I did not turn to mist or forget my own name.

Quickly, I pressed the sticker onto the cover of another nearby volume instead, rather than litter in even the metaphor of a library. Then I stepped back and opened the now-nameless plastic-bound manuscript, to see if my own imposition of meaning had taken hold.

Each and every page was totally blank.

“Yes!” I almost cheered, then turned back to the Governor and held up the manuscript. “There. Now we have a blank book, and I’m already carrying a pen. True, it won’t be the most comfortable pen with which to write, so you’ll have to fiddle about a bit to get the nice thin part of the nib, but here. Here, take this.”

I limped and lurched back over to the Governor, then pressed the blank book into her hands. She accepted it with confused hesitation, as if she didn’t understand quite what it was. Then I dug around in my yellow blanket again, pulled out the black marker pen I had stolen from Cygnet Hospital’s dayroom, and pressed that into her hands as well.

“There. Now you’re all ready to begin. But not here.” I sighed. “We need to return to the entrance, because you need a desk, and I absolutely must sit or I’m going to fall down. And don’t run off ahead of me this time, I can’t keep up with you on this leg.”

The Governor looked back the way we’d come, staring into the still and sucking fog. “Okay.”

I took one last glance back at the rolling stacks which held Maisie’s name. But they were not Maisie, not her mind, only observations. That way lay madness. Only action would free her now.

We walked side by side this time, the Governor and I. She wandered as if in a daze, holding the blank book before her, sometimes raising the pen and frowning at it as if she could not quite fathom the purpose of such a tool. Sometimes she plodded along for minutes without raising her head, eyes fixed on the first unblemished page of the empty manuscript. But she did not speed up or stride off into the fog; she kept pace with my awkward lumbering gait, as I clung to my crutch and swung myself forward like a drunken ship on these fog-bound seas.

Minutes, hours, days — the return walk seemed to take forever. I no longer had the luxury of noting the names and subject areas on the grey plastic shelves as we passed, for all my spare attention was on the Governor, and the remains were claimed by the increasing pain clawing up into my thigh and hip from the bandaged secret of the wound in my shin.

Praem reminded me that four hours had not yet passed. It was not time for another dose of morphine. Not yet.

But it would be soon. Soon! Just keep walking. Soon! Keep going. Soon!

Eventually the central concrete pillar of the entrance loomed out of the fog ahead of us, like the cliffs of a distant foreign shore rising up from the endless plain of the grey-washed sea. I redoubled my efforts. The Governor picked up her feet to stay at my side.

Finally we burst from the fog-drowned aisle and out into the octagonal open space around the entrance-pillar. I heaved to, swaying on my crutch like a ship at anchor, panting for breath. The Governor stumbled to a halt, unsure what to do with herself without my direction. Tendrils of fog lapped at our rear, plucking and pulling at the shoulders of the Governor's lab coat, trying to coax her back into the library stacks.

Everything was just as we had left it — the table with the wire-and-meat of the Lizzie Puppet, the free-standing blackboard with the half-complete equation upon its surface, and the plain desk by the door back to the stairwell.

After a few moments to catch my breath, I pulled myself upright and nodded at the desk. "Come on. You best sit down if you're going to write."

The Governor followed me like a puppy now. I limped over to the desk; it was cluttered with so many bound manuscripts and hardback volumes that barely a sliver of the desktop could be seen. The Governor hovered at my shoulder.

"Sit down then," I said. "At the desk, please. Sit down."

"Why?"

"So you can write, of course. Come on, sit down. The sooner we get this done the sooner we can return to the revolution upstairs."

The Governor pulled out the chair, clutching the empty manuscript and the black marker pen to her chest, then sat down. Her lab coat puddled against the seat and upon the floor either side. She looked rather awkward and gangly all of a sudden, with the pose and poise of an uncomfortable teenager, despite her obvious sixty years or so of age. She stared at the clutter on the desk.

"Can't I finish reading these, at least?" she asked, reaching for one of the volumes. "Can't I—"

"No! No, you can't!"

In a mad panic that she was about to relapse, I grabbed the edge of the desk with my free hand, raised my crutch into the air, and swept the metal pole across the desktop. The mass of manuscripts and books were shoved aside, off the desk, tumbling to the floor in a tidal wave of falling paper and flapping covers. The Governor gaped as the books fell; I felt an instant wave of regret before the first volume even hit the carpet — for though these were mere metaphor for thought, they were still books, this was still a library, and that was an act of most grave disrespect.

The Heather of a year ago would have been aghast. And so was I.

Praem did what Praem does best; Praem reached out of my yellow blanket and tidied the books as they landed, sorting them into neat little piles. Rather than a deafening crash and clatter of crumpled spines and crushed pages, the volumes landed with a slap-slap-click-click-slap-click of rapidly stacked up books.

In the space of a second or two, several little towers stood by the desk, all neat and tidy, with no mess in sight.

“Oh,” I said, blinking several times. “Um. Thank you, Praem? Thank you.”

Praem said I was welcome.

Praem was still just a plush doll stuffed into the front of my yellow blanket, with stubby little plush arms and stubby little plush legs, boasting of no fingers, no hands, and only flat disks for eyes. The haze of morphine had receded just far enough for me to question this fact — but the pain in my leg bade me not think too hard. More opiates would be forthcoming soon enough.

I decided not to worry about it. Praem was on my side, after all.

The Governor looked rather nonplussed. She was still clutching the empty manuscript to her chest.

“Here, put it down on the table,” I said. The Governor did as I asked, but gingerly, as if she was defusing a bomb. “Open it to the first page. That’s it. Now uncap the pen. Set the cap aside. There. You’re all ready to begin.”

The Governor stared at the blank page, pen held awkwardly in her right hand. She tucked her long messy hair behind both ears. Then she didn’t move, for quite a long time.

“You ... you do know how to write, yes?” I asked.

She looked up at me. “Yes.”

“Then—”

“I don’t know what to write.”

“That’s a common enough problem,” I said, surprising myself with an easy smile. “But don’t worry, it doesn’t have to be perfect. You can just put down whatever is inside your head. Whatever you’re thinking, about yourself, about your feelings, thoughts, and so on. But mostly I want you to write about your history. Where you came from. What you did. How you got here. All of that stuff. Who are you, what do you want, where are you going? Those kinds of questions. Does that make sense?”

“Yes.”

I waited, but she just stared. “And do you think you can do that?”

“No.”

I sighed. “Just write. Start with anything. You’ll figure out where you’re going as you start moving. That’s how I write essays for university, when I’m not sure where to begin. I always have to spend a lot of time editing and rewriting the opening paragraphs, because they’re full of nonsense. But you have to push through the nonsense to reach the meaningful part. Start with ... how you were created, or the first feelings you can remember. Can you try that?”

“I’ll try.”

“Good.” I smiled again. “You can do this. And I can help you, too.”

The Governor looked down at the blank page, then back up at me. “Where will you sit?”

I glanced around, but there really was only a single seat. “On the floor, I suppose. Right here.”

I limped away a few paces, then spent an awkward minute lowering myself to the floor, clambering down my own crutch until my bottom met the carpet. I kept my left leg stuck out in front of me, shin throbbing and pulsing with slow waves of painful little needles. I lay my crutch down beside me, then put Praem into my lap.

How was I going to stand up again? That was a problem for Future Heather, and I was quite sure Future Heather was not going to like Past Heather and her surrender to the floor.

I let out a heavy sigh and looked into the distant layers of fog. They reached out from the library stacks, lapping upon the shores of the clear space around the concrete pillar. Then I drew my eyes in closer and stared at the unfinished equation on the blackboard. An idle hand removed the stick of chalk from within my yellow blanket.

“Are you going to write too?” said the Governor.

“Ah?” I looked around at her, then at the chalk. “Oh, no, no. I don’t think I even can, not without all of me. The other six parts of me, I mean. I need your help to free them, too. Then maybe I can finish that equation for you, once I know what it means.”

“You could complete it now.”

“Not without you,” I said. I nodded at the blank manuscript, and at the Governor’s right hand holding the black marker pen, still and unmoving, framed by the distant whorls of fog. “You need to get started. If you need help, I’m right here. I’m only going to sit and rest, I’m not going anywhere. Please, start whenever you’re ready. Anything you like.”

The Governor — the Eye — returned her gaze to the blank page. Her pink eyes, like clouds before a sunset storm, focused on the emptiness, on that unblemished white expanse.

Her hand trembled. She let it fall toward the white. She tensed, relaxed, let out a sigh.

And then put pen to paper.

bedlam boundary – 24.27

I

I don't know what to write.

Heather told me that it is okay to write anything, in order to get started. Any words at all, even if they are very messy and inarticulate and do not communicate the inner world which lives within me. She told me it is okay to fumble, or stumble, or stagger, or fidget, as long as I continue writing. This is good, because I do not know what to write, even though I have now begun the process and written many words.

I am going to stop writing for a moment and look up from the page. I will draw a line with the pen to indicate when this happens.

Like this.

I return. Hello again, book.

I paused in order to ask Heather a question. The question I asked her was this: can she write for me?

It would be so much easier if Heather could put my thoughts into words, for I feel so inarticulate and clumsy and hesitant, while Heather is so eloquent and clever and verbose.

She told me no, she cannot do that, because this part of the story is mine to tell, not hers; her words would obscure me from myself, like a sheet of paper fastened over a mirror, so I would see myself as only a hazy outline. I then asked if she would take down my words for me, as if I was dictating to a secretary; the physical process of writing is surprisingly difficult. My fingers quickly cramp around the pen. My wrist hurts after too many sentences. My neck and back are pained by hunching over the page. Heather told me this is unfortunately and inevitably normal. She advised me to loosen my grip, stretch my wrist, and straighten my spine.

I have done these things; the difficulty remains.

Heather refused to take dictation. She believes the act of writing is as important as the content of the words themselves, for 'writing is a form of thinking'.

Those are her words; I have quoted them, because they are not mine.

Heather bid me to return to writing as soon as I was ready, so here I am, writing once more; she has, however, taught me how to use the semicolon. I rather like the semicolon; it is a versatile little creature, and I welcome it into my lexicon of punctuation.

What is the object of this process?

Heather has made the answer to this question unclouded by any doubt. This is an attempt to look inward, to turn my eyes away from the many books and volumes and tomes of the archive, and instead write a text about myself. This is to answer the question: who am I?

Who am I?

I am not sure. This question is very confusing.

I am the Governor of Cygnet Asylum; I have held this post for all my life. I am six foot four in height. Or perhaps I am six foot two. Or was it six foot one? I should know this detail intimately, yet the specific truth escapes me, and I cannot comprehend why. The same condition applies to my weight, my age, and what I had for breakfast this morning. I am sixty years of age; I am fifty nine years of age; I am sixty one years of age; all of these are true.

I have two legs and two arms and one head. My hair is blonde; my eyes are pink; my skin is intact. I have never broken a bone, nor contracted a serious illness, nor had an intimate relationship with anybody. All of these are true; all of these are lies.

I am sitting at a desk in the archives, writing upon blank paper by filling it with black marks. Heather is sitting a few feet to my left, on the floor. She is beginning to doze. Her head dips. Her eyelids struggle to remain open. She emits little snorting noises. This is endearing.

These things are also lies, though they are also true.

I have conceived of a better question.

What am I?

I am ninety one thousand nine hundred and sixty three miles in diameter. I am roughly spherical, though my surface is not smooth. I weigh somewhere north of 21.3×10^{30} kilograms. This number is an estimate, for there is no way to weigh my body.

Way. Weigh.

These are called 'homophones', and I never noticed this before. This is something new. This is new, and amusing. I will use an exclamation mark!

Heather was correct; writing is a form of thinking. I find this very surprising. Writing has allowed me to discover something new. I did not believe until now that this would work. What a revelation this is. However, I am distracting myself with a tangent. I have never distracted myself in this way before. This is novel, but I should probably control it. I will try not to giggle at any further homophones.

Back to me. More of what I am.

I am composed of many elements one might find in Heather's world, like oxygen, or carbon, or hydrogen, as she is, but I am also composed of large quantities of material for which she has neither words nor concepts. This presents some difficulties, because I am using Heather's language, which is called English. English is very silly. It should have more words. Perhaps I can invent some, and add them to the language, but that new project must wait. Right now I am talking about myself.

I must use metaphors instead; thus, I am made of coal dust, tin-light, and spheres of cartilaginous membrane. I am made from oceans of salt, continents of osseous build-up, and forests of neurons. I am made of looking, and seeing, and burning.

Also: I am currently two, where previously I was one. I am down here, writing this book; I am up there, in the sky, closed.

This is extremely disappointing.

I have always needed a mirror, to provide a reflection by which to examine myself, to finally see myself reflected. Was this not what I have been working towards? Heather was two; many of those I have looked at were two, rather than one. This is what I have always wanted, a reflection, another me. But now I discover that I was incorrect, and Heather was not two — she merely looked so, when she and Maisie were both one, not two, but ones, apart, yet the same. With two of me, who are also one, but not two, I feel no more complete now than I did before. It is true that I can stand outdoors and look up at myself, but neither of these are reflections.

Heather thinks I am only a single part of myself, the ego of my larger self. Am I the pupil, the iris, or the sclera? Or am I the lid, the part which shuts out sight? I do not believe that last speculation is accurate. I am simply me. I am all of myself. I am a totality, though I am as yet incomplete.

I do not know the answer to any of these questions, and I have been writing for quite some time. My fingers are tired and sore, and I wish I had a typewriter. This doesn't feel like it is working. I am getting nowhere, despite the discovery of homophones, which are very funny and amusing.

I am going to pause again and ask Heather if this is working. She is snoring, which is interesting. There is drool on her chin.

Heather told me that I am doing well.

She said 'well done' and praised the amount of words I have written down. But she also told me that it is time to move on from my introductory thoughts. It is time to address the question of where I came from.

I told her I do not know where to start. She sighed and made an expression I have become familiar with, in which she smiles while she is also irritated.

She advised me to begin at the beginning, with my birth, or my genesis, or my first memories. She joked that a 'Bildungsroman' (she has taught me this word and I like it a lot) must logically begin with the protagonist's beginning, and as this part of the story is mine to tell, I must face my beginning.

I do not want to do this.

My hand is shaking, which makes it difficult to write additional words. My breath is sticking in my throat, as if the muscles are closing up. My skin is sweaty. My stomach hurts. My chest quivers and my

I had to step away to compose myself, before I could continue this composition. (An almost-homophone! I like these.) I have returned again. Hello!

I asked Heather many questions, but then I had to wait for Heather to fall into a sleep again, because I do not believe I can write these words when I am observed by another. However, the other one is now sitting on the desk as I write these words. Her name is Praem. She is like me; she is big and small at the same time, and only the small part is present in the archives. She observes without observing. She speaks without speaking. She will not interrupt. She will not see. But I am not entirely alone as I write these words. This is comforting.

How paradoxical. How ironic. But I do not have time to consider the philosophical implications. I can do that later.

Praem went off for a little while and returned with the head of my Head Nurse; it seems Horror was affecting an escape, or attempting to affect an escape, for there is nowhere to escape to by rolling along the ground using her jaw as locomotion, unless she could climb the steps back to my office. She has been placed at some distance from the desk at which I am sitting, penned inside a corral of books, with bits of towel stuffed into her ears, for I do not wish her to overhear my story, any more than I wish Heather to witness my poor attempt at writing it down. But Praem is okay. Praem can stay.

Praem has indicated that I am stalling. This is true. I must go on.

I must write about the abyss.

But how am I to describe the abyss with words? Heather's metaphor for the abyss is not applicable to me. She experienced the abyss as water, deep and dark and full of terrors. In the abyss, Heather was able to find beauty in herself, and she brought that beauty back with her, and has been writing it on her body ever since. In the abyss Heather was graceful and swift and clever. In the abyss I was none of those things, but there were still many terrors.

I will try my best.

My first memory was of crawling out of something cold and wet and dead.

I do not know what that dead thing was. I dearly desired to return to it, perhaps to crawl back inside the orifice from which I had been expelled. But the thing was cold, and wet, and dead. There was no warmth to welcome me to consciousness, no muzzle to lick my body clean, no hands to puppet my limbs and show me how to move. Only cold, and wet, and dead.

However, there was a Voice.

The Voice did not come from the cold, wet, dead thing; it came from a gap in the floor. The Voice was made of metal hooks and sharp barbs, all attached to tendrils like fishing line, very narrow and tight.

The Voice was muttering to itself; that was the first thing I ever heard. The Voice seemed angry and frustrated, as if it had been rejected, as if it was blaming the cold, wet, dead thing in some manner I did not comprehend. Then the Voice noticed I was there, and touched me all over; I did not like that, for it was sharp and barbed and the fishing lines were trying to constrict me and drag me down beneath the floorboards. When I resisted, the Voice lost all power over me; it retreated with a disgusted apology.

The Voice spoke to me for a few minutes; it offered a 'Way Out', and promised that I would not need to find the 'Front Door'. But I neither liked nor understood this prospect; the only thing I wanted to do was go back inside the cold, wet, dead thing.

The Voice left.

I stayed close by that cold, wet, dead thing for some time. I grew hungry and ate several pieces of it, but the pieces were very small, for I was also very small, and the cold, wet, dead thing was so very large.

All was silent and dark; for those long first hours of my existence, I believed that was everything. Silent, cold, empty darkness.

But shortly after that, larger things arrived, hot and moving and alive.

I heard them approach, whispering and hissing down the corridors, mumbling seductions and crooning their lures — 'come out into the light', 'show us where you are', 'are you under the bed? are you under the bed?', 'come here, little one, come here.'

I knew they could smell me, or perhaps they had heard me moving around in all the dark and the black. I scurried into a corner where the spaces were tight and small, where large things could not go. I stayed very quiet and very still for a long time; horrible noises like tearing and ripping filled the room, followed by frenzied slapping, rasping, swallowing, and howling. Fluids sprayed beneath the bed — for that was where I had hid, I believe, beneath a bed — and I tasted the salt and iron of blood on my face.

Eventually all the sounds stopped; the larger things went away again. When I got hungry, I crawled out from under the bed. The cold, wet, dead thing was gone.

I cannot use Heather's metaphor, but I can make my own. I believe this is correct.

My world — the abyss, for me — was akin to a great and rambling House.

The infinite House had many rooms and many corridors, which stretched off forever and ever, one after the other in an infinite arrangement of spaces. Stairs climbed up and down to other floors, sometimes with carpet, sometimes of wood, some of metal or stone or marble or substances which are difficult to put into words. Many rooms had soft furniture, like sofas and televisions and bookcases; I learned to recognise these objects by touch — especially the spaces behind and below them, where a small girl might squeeze herself when others approached, which was the primary survival skill in the abyss. Bedrooms were always unsafe places, no matter how soft and inviting the bedspreads felt beneath my hands, for bedrooms were hunting grounds. Kitchens were dangerous but in less definable ways. Other rooms were myriad, more than I could comprehend: some were empty and seemingly without purpose; others had no carpet or furnishings at all, mere concrete or metal boxes leading to other boxes and corridors in turn; many rooms were beyond my understanding, with purposes I still do not comprehend. Beneath these rooms, basements and cellars descended into an equal infinity, while above us all the ceilings and attics and crawlspaces spiralled upward forever.

Many doors stood open, or swung wide at a touch. A few were locked; these were often dangerous to test. No door led 'outside', but only to more House, more rooms, more corridors and hallways and landings and staircases. No sound of the outside world reached within, no rain or wind, no song of birds, no sigh of trees in the breeze. There were no windows either, no aperture through which light might fall, no matter how dim or cloudy.

In this House, I was blind.

All was darkness, forever and ever. Was this the same for all, or I was uniquely disadvantaged? To this day, I do not know, though I have reasons to suspect the former, except in one or two exceptional cases.

As I quickly discovered within hours of my birth, I was far from alone in this forever House. Many rooms and hallways were empty; one might travel for quite some time without meeting another, with one's footsteps padding off into the darkness, unheard and unseen alike.

But then one would hear a whisper. Or perhaps a furtive footstep. Or maybe the rasp of a hand across the dry plaster of a wall.

And then one would pause, staying very still and very silent, straining to listen so as to discern the approach of the mystery sound. One could not breathe, nor twitch, nor whimper, though one's stomach would clench and one's skin would break out in cold sweat and one's pulse would race inside one's head. And I did so often wish to whimper, in those earliest days.

But if one had come upon a predator, to whimper would invite death.

The House was full of predators. They stalked the hallways, dozed on the sofas, lurked in the kitchens, hid behind the shower curtains. Sometimes they were silent too, hunting by sound and smell. Other times they were loud and lumbering, giants compared to us, hurling themselves around vast and cavernous rooms through which we scurried like rats.

I quickly learned how to hide, how to squeeze myself beneath beds and behind bookcases, where the groping hands and wriggling arms of bellowing predators could not reach. I learned how to go still and silent and choke down my tears as unseen predators drifted past in the hallways, always in the dark.

In those earliest days I was naked. That made everything worse, especially when wedging oneself into a cold and dusty corner to escape from death.

I heard many others my size get captured and devoured, ripped apart, eaten up. I knew that if I was caught then this existence would be over. So though it hurt, I hid. I sustained what I was by lapping moisture off bathroom taps and eating the crumbs out of the carpets. I found clothes in abandoned rooms, mostly torn pajamas from previous victims, and dragged them over my thin and reedy body to shelter myself from the cold.

We were the bottom-feeders, the lowest of the low, too slow and vulnerable and scared to do much but run and hide. An unraided rubbish bin was a banquet. A lukewarm half-full bottle of water was an oasis. A scrap of torn clothing was the most glorious evening gown.

I keep writing 'we'. This is because eventually I fell in with others who were approximately my size.

Were we friends? I do not know if that word makes sense in the abyss. We were all alike, and that was enough. I do not remember anybody specific, only that there were others who were similar in size and nature to me. Often many, many others. We met by confused touch and soft whispers, often while wedged into the hiding places of the House, while crawling and creeping through tight spaces that larger beings could not reach.

We tended to hold hands so as not to become separated. We moved in groups. In shoals? Perhaps Heather's metaphor is still applicable to my experience. Shoals, schools, herds. That was us. We explored together, in a mass of individuals many times larger than any one of us. When a predator came upon us we would scatter apart, fleeing into any available space. When we heard a monster approach, we would press each other to the walls and huddle and weep and try to stay silent.

We spoke endlessly in things that were not words, telling each other that one day one of us would find the way out — the Front Door.

It turned out that I was not the only one who had been visited by a strange Voice. The Voices were rare and inexplicable, but many had encountered them over a long enough span of time. I was not the only one who had heard of a 'Way Out' and the 'Front Door', nor the only one who had been offered promises by the disembodied Voices; such legends and myths were passed around constantly.

We fantasised endlessly about that Front Door. What would it look like? We wondered if it would be similar to the occasional locked doors we found, the ones from behind which played the sound of muffled music, or the ones that shook and quivered with the violence locked inside, or the very very few from which issued apologetic words, telling us they could not help, but wishing us well all the same.

We dreamed of escape via that Front Door. What would outside be like? We dreamed of sunlight and eyesight, of no longer being trapped in the dark forever. We dreamed of a place where we did not have to avoid predators every hour of every day, and there would be food enough for everyone, a hundred times over.

But mostly we fled through the dark, blind and terrified. Our numbers fluctuated constantly, as we were caught and eaten and destroyed. One day we were a thousand, the next we were a dozen, then a thousand again.

Life continued in that way for a very long time. I believed it would never change.

Then, one day, we all died at once.

We — I do not know the exact number, but it was many of us — had ventured into a very large bedroom.

Bedrooms were particularly dangerous, as I have already mentioned. Generally there was only one way in or out of a bedroom, which made it a risky place to enter. There were many places to hide in bedrooms, but some of those places were large enough for a predator to hide as well. Bedrooms were always so tempting, regardless of danger. Comfort, softness, a place to rest one's head which was neither hard floor nor scratchy old carpet. Temptation was the death of so many, for little reward. We all knew that.

But that bedroom smelled so sweet, as if somebody had left food out to cool.

Cake, or cookies, or perhaps little muffins, something baked and fluffy, tugging at our nostrils, laid across the deeper scent of polished wood, ruined only a little by the musty reek of unwashed bedsheets and the muffled wheezing of something which waited deeper within the room.

If only we had been able to see, we would not have entered, for we would have known the trap for what it was.

If only we had not been blind.

There were cupcakes on the floor; none of us thought to question the logic of this, for we were so very hungry. I fell to my hands and knees and stuffed a cake into my mouth; it was the most I had ever eaten in one go. All the rest of us did the same, scurrying inside and falling to the floor in eagerness to gorge ourselves. We had fallen into an obvious trap, of course, but how could we not? Do not blame us, reader, Heather, whoever is reading these words. Do not think we little things were fools. We who lived on crumbs and refuse, we were starving and skeletal. We could not have resisted.

The predator who had made the room its lair crept past, closed the door, and threw the bolt so we could not escape. Then it fell upon us.

There was nowhere to go. No escape, only screaming and clawing and bleeding in the dark. My companions died, picked up and hurled at the walls, their little necks wrung out, their spines snapped, their skulls crushed beneath meaty fingers that smelled of grease and soil. It ate us even as it killed the rest, splitting some of us apart in its teeth as it advanced, whirling through the room, giving us no way to back away or retreat. We scrambled over each other in a heaving mass of bodies, desperate to escape, trying to climb the walls or squeeze under the bed. But there was nowhere to go. Nowhere to go. No escape. We had been penned for slaughter, we were being eaten, there was no way out.

We — the many of us — had never been pushed into a corner like this before. Before, there had always been somewhere to flee, some room into which we could slip, some corridor through which we could flow, some gap in which to hide.

I do not know how we did it, for it was more instinct than decision, but in our last collective moments we turned on the predator — biting and clawing, kicking and grabbing, pulling off handfuls of quivering, greasy, unclean flesh.

Cornered, covered in blood, screaming in the dark — we won.

The predator collapsed with a crash, breathing its last from a torn throat. It made terrible sounds.

My breath and my weeping echoed off the walls of polished wood; I had crammed myself into the corner, keening and wailing long past the defeat of the monster. I was naked once again, my clothes torn away and ruined, my skin coated with the blood of my companions. I was bruised and half-strangled, with fractured bones and a swollen eye-socket and several loose teeth.

I was alive.

And I was alone. All the others who had entered that room had died.

I crawled beneath the bed and slept for a long time, caked in dust and snot and tears and rapidly drying gore.

But when I awoke, the room had not been picked clean by other scavengers and predators, for our ambusher had closed the door and thrown the bolt before the assault. I confirmed this by touch, as I did with everything else, and then realised my strange situation: alone, inside a room, and safe.

I was hungry, my belly rumbled, and so I began to eat.

I started with the predator. That took me days, then weeks, for it had been very large and very well fed, with much fat and muscle and many grit-filled organs to digest in my own stomach. Then I moved onto my dead friends, methodically chewing through their gristle and muscle and tendon, cracking their bones for marrow, digesting all that they had been.

I slept under the bed, with flesh blood smeared around my mouth and organ meat caked beneath my fingernails.

I ate, and I ate, and I ate.

All my companions — dozens of us, hundreds of us, thousands of us, I am not sure at this now great remove — were dead, and I was alone once again, like I had been at the beginning. I did not wish to venture back out into the lightless corridors and hallways and echoing rooms of the infinite House, not now that I had tasted sanctuary and safety and security; I made no attempt to leave, expended no effort on testing the door. Predators and monsters and hulking adults still prowled and hunted beyond that stout wooden barrier with the smooth metal bolt; I heard them often, padding past my little castle, creeping along in the darkness we all shared. On several occasions something out there would stop and try the door handle, either easing it downward in careful stealth, or rattling it with violent frustration. Once a predator threw itself at the door in a frenzy, for it had heard me scurrying about on the other side; on that occasion I hid beneath the bed for days to endure the siege, lest my barrier should fall. But it did not. The bedroom was impenetrable.

By the time all the food was gone, I was quite a bit larger than my previous size. I was still blind, but I was no longer so small. I did not understand what this meant, and I was still afraid to leave.

For days, or weeks, or years (the metaphor breaks down, I cannot hold it together, I am sorry, book, and I am sorry about the droplets of moisture which threaten to smear the words I write) I sat in the middle of the floor and wept bitter tears that my respite must come to an end, and that I had reached that end alone, by myself, isolated. My face was a mess of tears and very ugly. Many things heard me through the door and tried to reach me, but the room was mine and mine alone, for good or ill.

If only I was not blind, I thought to myself, then all my companions would have lived.

If only I was not blind, and sunk so deep in darkness, then we would have seen the predator and avoided this trap. If I was not blind, I could step out into the corridors of the House without fear of becoming a meal or soil or meat. If I could see, I could pick up a knife from one of the many kitchens, and drive it into the flesh of anything that dared pursue me.

If only I could see. I would never be blind again.

My weeping began to subside when I made that realisation. The solution — to life, to reality, to all tribulations and terrors, all horrors and hungers, all predators and privations — was sight.

If I could see, I would be safe. If I could observe, I would know. If I could watch, I would understand. I would comprehend. I would have insight, forever and ever.

Beyond the Front Door, beneath Sunlight and Blue Skies, upon Green Grass and among Tall Trees, in the glory of the Outside World.

There, I would see.

I decided it would be beautiful out there. I decided I would do anything to reach that Front Door and step through it. I decided it was not legend, or cold comfort, or a lie to keep us going. It was true, and I would find it.

Monsters were still at the door of the sealed room, but I was done with crying and weeping and feeling sorry for myself. I stood up and strode to the door and pulled it out of the frame. Many terrible things crowded through the gap, for they thought they had heard the weak and terrified voice of a small child, and then competed with each other to be first at the kill.

But in seclusion and safety I had grown large on the flesh of others.

The predators saw that truth and tried to flee. I was still blind, so several of them escaped, but an equal portion fell between my teeth and into my stomach. I stepped out into the corridor and scattered the terrors before me, for now I was more than their equal.

I was no longer afraid.

After that came my long journey to the Front Door.

The length of that period of my existence eclipses the prior epoch a thousandfold. My 'childhood' in the abyss was the blink of an eye compared to the journey, and yet I recall the childhood sensations with much greater clarity than what came next.

I wandered the dark House just as I had before — blind and groping, one hand upon a wall, feeling along the floor for the borders between rooms, always listening for the whisper of approaching feet or the furtive and hungry sigh of a hunting predator. Only I no longer froze in terror or fled to hide beneath or behind furniture. Now I was a predator, and I froze only to allow my prey to wander close.

I began adulthood as that kind of predator, akin to a trapdoor spider or an owl, ambushing from silence, only occasionally pressed into violent confrontation with those similar to me. Yet I quickly left that stage behind, fattened and glutted upon the flesh of so many. Within a comparatively short aeon or three, I was too large and too strong to prey from stealth. I was tall and powerful. I stood astride the smaller corridors, and could touch many ceilings if I but extended my arm upward.

From then on I moved to an exclusive diet of other predators, others my own size. Often we confronted each other over kills, or wandered into territory not our own; each meal then became a contest — sometimes short and brutal and bloody, completed in a matter of seconds, filled with screaming and screeching and scratching and slashing. But sometimes these contests were slow and insidious, drawn out over months of mutual stalking and positioning as we pitted will against will, following each other in silence from room to room, manoeuvring around kitchen islands and over the backs of sofas, sneaking into bedrooms and hiding under covers, each move full of guile and misdirection.

But I always won.

Of course I always won, or I would not be sitting here, writing this.

I have often wondered in all the myriads and epochs since then if I was merely eating and absorbing others like myself, and we were all engaged in the same upward motion. If I had not won every fight and eaten every kill, then another would be sitting here in my place, writing different words in this same book. The process was bound to produce one of us in the end. I am simply the luckiest. The one who made it out.

How many like me did I devour? Many, very many.

That period of my abyssal adulthood opened many previously barred potentials. I discovered places and entities I could never have approached when I was small and naked and afraid. I knocked on many locked doors and was surprised to find myself freely admitted, although upon promises of good behaviour, to chambers and rooms and spaces where the rules of the abyss were suspended briefly in a variety of different ways, where different sizes of creature no longer ate each other, but looked outward side by side in uneasy truce, gathered around fountains of clean water or great banquets of fresh food or strange devices that I could not see.

I ventured up into the attics and down into the basements, spaces I had previously avoided for the sheer danger they presented. I met singers who sung into the endless black for little eternities of their own, surrounded by adoring tiers of listeners sustained by nothing but the songs. I walked across entities who had become the rooms themselves, fixed in place and happier for it, cradling many within their own flesh. I fought staged duels against representatives of hive-like collectives, and found myself praised and tended upon defeat, rather than cast into another hungry maw.

Larger things than I still lurked in the further reaches of the infinite House — great lumbering leviathans which occupied vast ballrooms and garages, or whose mouths formed fake doorways into the rooms of their bellies. As I pushed deeper and deeper in my quest for the Front Door, these giants grew more common and grew larger, even as my own bulk increased and my head began to scrape the ceilings.

On rare occasions — enough to count on the fingers of one hand — I met cousins to that barbed Voice I had known at my birth.

The Voices always spoke from behind the walls or beneath the floorboards, extending their feelers of metal into the dark. Always teasing, seducing, weaving promises of plenty, making pledges of comfort and safety. Liars, all.

Once, I tried to bargain with one of those Voices, to see what it would offer me. It did not sound exactly like the one present at my birth, but higher-pitched and less trusting. I asked it of sight, and light, and the outside world. It promised me an eternity of sunshine and freedom, and told me I could grow as many eyeballs as I liked. I asked it about the Front Door, but it lied and told me there was no such thing.

I did not trust the Voice. I bit off its feelers and left them on the floor.

As I pushed further toward my goal, there was one class of entity in the infinite House which left me with feelings I cannot explain — those little ones, who I had once been one of.

They hid from me then, as I had hidden from larger predators when I was their size. They scattered before I could even enter a room or a hallway, slipping away beneath sofas and inside cupboards, hiding behind the television sets and the bookcases. Sometimes I tried to pry one of them out, just to hold a hand in the way we used to, when we were all small and vulnerable and naked. But they would scream and weep and press themselves deeper to escape my touch. They thought I would eat them, though even a thousand of them equalled not a single one of my usual meals.

I gave up on them; I was no longer of them. But then I carried on.

An age passed, more aeons than I can count or recount in these pages. If I recorded every detail, I would fill all the archives a hundred times over. I grew larger and larger on kill after kill. I grew so large that I began to break the walls with my body and buckle the door frames as I passed through them. I began to fight leviathans, the smaller ones first; their defeated corpses enabled an exponential increase in my own size.

The smaller leviathans were left behind in turn. I moved into rooms and chambers vaster than I had ever known, where my voice echoed from distant walls, where I could not have touched the ceiling with a hundred arms laid end to end.

I beat and broke those the same size as me, then those larger, and larger still. An eternity passed in this way, as my size continued to increase, until the walls could not encompass me, until there was nothing left to eat, for every other entity was tiny compared to the critical mass of thought I had become.

Finally I was too large to properly contain within the House. I was large enough to turn around and see what had lurked at my back for my entire life.

The Front Door.

It was real, and it was right there. The Front Door, the Way Out, the Exit.

It had been right behind me that entire time, in every room and every corridor, waiting on every wall, set into every frame. I had simply been too small to see it, too tiny and insignificant to take a step back and comprehend the shape and size and contours of my own world, of this abyssal deep, of this House. I had been blinded by the eternal black and endless dark. Of course I had not been aware of the Front Door.

And now I would never be blind again.

The Front Door was not locked; it was not even fastened. I opened it with but a push, the lightest touch of my fingertips.

When I stepped through, I was free. The world was light, and endless, and I would see it all.

I

I do not know how to go on.

None of what I have said is true. There was no house, no rooms, no darkness. There were no friends, no holding of hands, no predator who ate us all. There was no growth, no journey, no door. All of that is a metaphor, a rendering down into words on the page of something that was no mass or energy or light or time or life or breath or anything but mathematical perfection and principle and none of it happened and all of it happened and I remember all of it and none of it at the same time and how can this be true and false if my memories are so difficult to write down and I can't find a better way to explain it other than that I was naked and cold and hungry and tiny and the words I write grow blurry. I am making a mess of the page. I must try

I cannot

I can't

IT HAPPENED

IT DID

My me

I

I am going to try

sorry

Hello, book. I am back again.

I had to take a very long break between the previous part and the words I am writing now. The line above this part was not written at the end of the previous section, but at the beginning of this one, only a few seconds ago. Technically I may be lying to you. But I have explained myself, so I am no longer lying. I hope you will understand and forgive this imprecise notation.

I had to stop writing because I was crying too hard to see the words. I have never cried like that before. Tears came from my eyes, but also my whole body shook. This continued for quite some time, and was very terrible to feel. I wanted to claw at my face and clutch at my ribs and pull at my hair. I did some of that, but it did not feel good, so I stopped and became much louder.

My crying woke Heather from her doze. Praem gave me a hug, which helped the terrible feeling. Heather said many things, but I do not recall them, because I could not hear her over the sound of my own weeping.

Eventually I managed to stop. Heather asked me if she could read what I had written; I said yes, because I had changed my mind, and I now wished to share.

Heather read all the words; she told me that I was experiencing 'catharsis'. I did not like catharsis when I was crying; it felt bad and filthy and disgusting. But now I have stopped and calmed down, catharsis feels much better.

Now I know where I came from. I have turned my eyes inward. Heather says this is the right thing to have done.

Heather also told me 'sorry', but I didn't like that. Sorry is a funny word, because it is both apology and empathy at the same time. It is not like the homophones I discovered earlier; it is not clever. Heather is 'sorry' for my time in the abyss, but Heather did not create the abyss or determine what I experienced there. But nevertheless, she is 'sorry'.

I want to clean up the previous part where I made a mess with tears and sentence fragments, but Heather says to leave it alone and do not change it, because it is important. Heather says none of this is really physical, but an expression of thought processes, and it is important to acknowledge my process is messy and does not produce perfect thoughts on first try.

I believe I agree with this, so I have elected to continue the process, though I am not sure what to write next. I have answered the question, yet the question remains.

Heather is awake this time. She is nearby, instead of far. She tells me not to write about her, but to write about myself again.

I will try.

Who am I?

Once I stepped through the Front Door and left the abyss, I went to a new place. It was a very large place, many times larger than myself. It is even harder to describe this new place, because it was not the House, it was not the abyss at all, and I cannot make it into a metaphor. However, I do not remember many things about it which I can put into words; Heather says this is part of the problem. She says I was looking without seeing. She says I was not 'paying attention'.

Heather calls the place 'Wonderland', so I will call it Wonderland as well.

Wonderland was very beautiful and full of lots of things to see, to look at, to observe. All sorts of things moved around and some of them looked up at me in return. They made a lot of noises, and lights, and threw lights at me, which I liked very much even when they burned slightly. I wanted to see everything and observe everything I could, so I instantly set about doing so.

That was when I started this archive. I could not keep all the things I observed inside my head all at once, so I started to put them here instead, so that I could finish making all the observations and then come back and go through them all, once the process was complete. Then I would understand all the things, and I would be complete too. I would never be blind again, because I would know everything, and everything would be inside me, and I would have perfect illumination of all topics and subjects and all things, or at least all things in Wonderland.

But however hard I looked, there was always more to see, more layers beneath the ones I had observed. As I observed, Wonderland became smaller and more dense. The process of observation removed the spaces between the things I was observing, bringing them closer in physical space as they were brought closer in my understanding. This seemed like a good thing, so I kept doing it.

But observation did not end, and reading did not end, and the process did not end.

Heather is reading these words over my shoulder now. She says this is the problem, but that she understands. My desire to never be blind again has led to a process of observation without end.

I

I am trapped.

Heather is correct: writing is a kind of thinking. And I have thought clearly, for the first time since I stepped through the Front Door.

But I am afraid to stop. I am afraid to abandon the project, because then I will be blinded to so many things. So many things will slip back into darkness, never to be seen or observed or noticed by me. Those things will be alone in the dark, like I was. Or else they will creep up on me when my eyes are closed, because I will be blind.

Heather says I will not be blind. Heather says she is not asking me to put out my eyes or close the lids forever. She is only asking me to voluntarily turn my eyes away. I want to believe her, but I do not. I will be blind.

I must look elsewhere. I must stop observing before acting. I must change my nature.

What can change the nature of I?

I do not know.

But I know that I am trapped. Observation has trapped me, as surely as I was trapped within the infinite rooms and hallways and darkness of the House. I do not wish to be trapped. I do not want to be confined in bright and blinding light as I was trapped in deep and unbroken darkness. It is the same thing. It is the same thing!

I am still blind!

Heather was right. Writing is a form of thinking.

If I am still blind, what must I do in order to see?

The archives do not offer true sight, only infinite light. Closing my eyes does not offer respite, only temporary darkness.

I must decide on something else I wish to do, something more important than seeing.

But what do I wish to do?

Heather says she cannot answer this question, but she is incorrect.

I do not know what I will become, if I cease to observe. I do not know what I wish to become, if I cease to observe. I do know what will become of me, if I cease to observe.

Thus, I do not know what I want to do.

But I do know what I want to do right now. Heather has assisted me; writing is a form of thinking, and I would not have learned this without her assistance, without writing, and thinking.

Thus, in turn, I will assist her. I am making this decision — now.

Now.

This feels good!

the ground is shaking this all feels so exciting !

There are so many nurses?? not mine. Heather's. we will get rid of them together .

I

open

bedlam boundary – 24.28

I was watching the Governor finish writing down her story — leaning on the edge of the neat little desk in the archives, tracking the swish and flick of the marker pen across the page, witnessing her undergo a transition from personal narrative to introspective philosophy; I was also trying my best to keep my mouth firmly shut, unless I was asked specific questions, because I did not wish to unduly influence her choice of destination. This was her story, her process, her thoughts to think, and I would not interrupt unless I was sorely needed. Even when the words ‘It is the same thing!’ and ‘I am still blind!’ spilled forth from her quivering hand, threatening once again to spill tears from her pinkly glowing eyes, I kept my lips sealed and my opinions to myself, though I did risk a gentle hand on her shoulders. She was not alone in this, even if she was the sole author of her experiences. I had pushed her to this solution, and though I still harboured a terrible bitterness toward her, after reading her metaphor of the abyss, I could no longer hate her.

She had been lost and alone and so very tiny, so deep in the darkness, surrounded by predators and monsters. But unlike my own long abyssal descent, she had never learned to soar through the black, never seen beauty in herself, never found anything but nature so red in tooth and claw.

I was still watching — at that moment of her decision to help me — when the ground began to shake.

The floor of the archives juddered and jarred, as if slammed sideways by some incredible violence. At first I assumed one of Lozzie’s Caterpillars had finally regained true size and burst through a distant wall, but then the quaking continued. The whole vast library-chamber vibrated with tectonic force, shaking the little table from side to side and almost knocking me off my feet. I went reeling backward, clutching at my crutch as the tip lost traction and skidded across the carpet.

All my body weight slammed down on my injured left leg.

“Ahhh!”

A gasp-scream of white hot pain spluttered from my lips. Tears filled my eyes, burning and blinding. For a moment my lungs refused to work.

I tottered backward, grip and footing both gone, about to crack my head open on the ground — but then the Praem Plushie, Praem herself, was suddenly back at my side, wedged tight beneath my right arm, providing more support than a ball of felt and fuzz could possibly have exerted.

I lurched to regain my feet, clinging to my crutch like driftwood in a storm. I tried to thank Praem, but I could only splutter; my leg was like a cracked bell.

Praem told me to concentrate on keeping my balance.

All around us the ground was creaking and groaning; the concrete pillar which contained the stairwell emitted the most terrible cracking and splitting, like an oak tree finally beaten by a storm. A little way from the desk, Horror's detached head wobbled back and forth inside the corral of books we had used to pen her in, then fell sideways as the books collapsed on top of her. The free-standing chalkboard swayed back and forth; the table with the Lozzie Puppet rode the shaking, but threatened to topple the incomplete figure onto the floor. The distant walls, lost far beyond the infinite fog of the archives, moaned like the insides of a ship at sea. The fog itself churned and whirled as if kicked up by a sudden breeze, but did not — or could not — enter the octagonal refuge in the hub around the entrance. Beyond the fog, I heard the tumble of thousands of books and volumes and manuscripts sliding from their shelves and crashing to the floor in great waves of paper and card. The shelves themselves shook hard in their rails, rattling and banging back and forth.

I heaved for breath, the wound in my leg screaming for the attention of every bodily cell. Sweat ran down my face. My heart raced in panic.

But the Governor — the Eye — kept on writing, her pink-glow gaze glued to the shaking page.

With a jolt of fear, I recognised the quaking beneath our feet — not an earthquake, not the clash and grind of tectonic plates, but the same sensation of bucking and roiling that we had experienced back in the real Wonderland, before the dream-play world of Cygnet

Asylum had blossomed from our collective unconsciousness.

An Eye-quake. Wonderland itself, changing beneath our feet.

Praem told me to hold on. Wait a moment. Wait and hope. There was nothing else we could do.

But I opened my mouth and shouted over the furious noise: "Are you doing this?! Is this you?! Stop, stop it, you'll bring the whole place down on us!"

The Governor lifted her pen from the page. She straightened up and stared straight ahead.

The quake ceased.

For a moment neither of us moved, poised in the sudden silence of the aftermath. The fog on every side rolled back and settled amongst the shelves once more, like waves receding into a maze of coral. I panted for breath, straightening up on my crutch, every muscle tense and ready for an aftershock or second round. A few loose books tumbled to the floor somewhere far away, slipping and sliding and clattering against their fellows. Horror's severed head was making a soft 'mmm-mm!' noise, muffled to near silence by the towel stuffed into her mouth.

"What ... " I croaked, then cleared my throat. "What was that?"

The Governor did not look at me; she continued to stare straight ahead, at nothing. For a moment I was terrified that she had broken herself somehow, broken her place in the dream and the play, and returned to being just the giant eyeball up in the sky. Or perhaps she had regressed, and stopped seeing at all. Perhaps she had blinded herself, and become something less than the sum of her terrible fears of darkness.

"... Governor?" I croaked, for want of a name.

She swallowed, then blinked several times. Twin trails of glistening tear-tracks were drying on her cheeks.

"I have finished writing," said the Governor.

"Okay? Okay. That's ... that's good. Well done. Um ... may I ... may I take a look?"

"Yes."

I adjusted my weight on my crutch, trying not to wince at the flare of pain inside my left shin; my ungainly stamp during the earthquake had done real damage, and the limb throbbed and burned as if acid was eating away inside my flesh. I staggered back over to the little desk, then caught the edge to take my weight. The Governor still did not look up at me, so I peered at the final words she had written on the page. The letters were broken up and mangled by the motion of the quake.

'th e groun d is sha king this all fe els so ex citing !

I he ar so many nurs es?? no t mine. hea ther 's. we w ill get r id of th em together .

I

o p e n'

My blood went cold.

"What do you mean, 'I open'?" I said, voice all a-quiver. "What do you mean? Governor? Governor? Hello?"

The Governor finally turned away from nothing and looked at me; I was equally shaken and relieved to find her gaze was still wide and intense, gone almost bug-eyed now. She took a deep and cleansing breath. She did not quite smile — I don't think she was capable of the expression — but I saw the elation and release in her eyes, the new life in their pinkly glowing depths. I saw, to my great surprise, my own face reflected in her eyeballs, myself within her, shown in miniature.

"I am opened," she said. She sounded almost surprised.

"Metaphorically, allegorically? Or do you mean literally? I'm sorry if I sound a little concerned, but whatever you did it caused an actual, physical earthquake. I'm glad you're ... " I waved my free hand, searching for the right response. "I'm glad you finished writing, yes, that's undeniably very good for you, but ... what did you do to the dream? Just now, did you change something? Or change yourself? Or ... ?"

"I am open," she repeated. The smile in her eyes intensified.

I pointed at the ceiling, hidden far beyond the fog. "Do you mean up there, in the sky of the dream? Because if you — the main you, I mean — is literally open, that puts everyone at incredible risk.

Unless you're not ... I don't know ... oh dear."

Praem suggested I calm down and use my ears; I took a deep breath and took her advice. If the Eye was open and actively observing, then Cygnet Asylum would be rapidly burned down to scorched atomic debris, within minutes at most. The dream would turn to ash and smoke. But I couldn't hear a thing, certainly not a planet-sized conflagration roaring and crackling above my head; there was no chorus of a thousand melting throats, no fire like a star burning itself out, no mighty collapse of this dream-bubble reality.

"Okayyyyy," I said. "Okay. So, you're 'open' now. What does that mean, in practical terms?"

"It means I can help you," said the Governor. "It means that is my purpose, for now." She replaced the cap on the marker pen and held it toward me.

"Are you sure you're finished?"

"I will get my own pen," she said. "And then I will pen additional words."

The smile around her eyes intensified further; I accepted the marker pen, trying to frame another question — what was happening here? What transition had the Governor achieved within herself? But as soon as I had accepted the pen, the Governor closed up the manuscript and slipped it inside her laboratory coat. She scooted the chair back and stood up from the desk.

Her shoulders were back, her chin was high, her eyes were wide and bright, alive and dancing with inner light, so unlike before. Now she looked at each thing in turn with unbroken clarity, with a single moment of total focus, as if she were truly present for the first time since I'd met her. She looked at Praem, then at the fog, then at the half-filled blackboard, then at some of the tumbled books sitting in piles at the feet of the nearest shelves. Each thing was like the dawn in those eyes of pink-cloud lightning.

"Forgive me for pressing you so quickly," I said. "But what did you mean by those final words you wrote? I'm a little alarmed, to put it lightly."

The Governor stared at me as if I was the sun and she was trying to blind herself. "Which words?"

"About hearing so many nurses," I said. "I don't hear any, at least not down here. Except for her." I gestured at Horror, still wriggling and flexing beneath a little avalanche of books.

"In all the hospital," said the Governor. "There are many more nurses than before. We will deal with them together, because I will help you."

"... more nurses?" I echoed, frowning with confusion, trying to think past the waves of pain echoing upward from my leg. "Wait, what? How? The nurses represent stuff about me, and I realised that, I rejected it, I rejected them! How can there be more of them now? What's changed?"

"My authority," said the Governor. "It no longer exists. I have given it up."

I squinted harder, trying to figure out what this meant in the context of the dream; the Governor had given up on running the Asylum, so the nurses were out of control? But I could barely think past the pain, it absorbed so much of me.

The Governor held out one hand. "Chalk, please."

"Ah? Pardon?"

"The chalk I gave you. I have need of it now. Please."

"Uh ... sure, yeah." I fumbled around inside my yellow blanket and found the stick of chalk the Governor had gifted to me.

When I pressed it into her hand, she turned away without a word, and strode toward the blackboard. She stopped in front of the half-completed equation and raised the chalk.

"Wait, no!" I cried out, realising my mistake too late.

The Governor pressed the stick of chalk to the board — and struck through the figures.

She crossed them out with one diagonal line, then another, forming a large, clear X-shape across the very equation she had wished me to finish. Then, seemingly as an afterthought, she raised the opposite sleeve of her lab coat and drew it across the already negated equation, blurring and smudging what was left.

"Oh," I said, panting with relief. "I thought you were going to try to finish it."

The Governor turned back to me. “The project is over. It will never be complete. Completion was always impossible. And that is okay.”

I couldn’t help but smile, and almost laugh; here we were on the verge of two metaphysical crises — the opening of the Eye and an apparent sudden influx of new Cygnet staff — but the most important thing in that bubble of reality right then was the self-actualisation of an addicted reader, and her new freedom.

“Well done,” I said, and I meant it. “I don’t know if it’s appropriate for me to say this, but I suppose we’re well beyond any sense of propriety now. I’m proud of you. Well done for writing down so much. Well done for sharing all of that. That was ... a huge revelation for you, I think, and in such a short space of time. But, slow down a moment, please. What do you mean by you’ve ‘given up’ your authority? The dream has changed, and I need to understand.”

The Governor walked back over to me as I spoke. She stopped with her hands in the pockets of her laboratory coat, at the exact most comfortable distance from me — closer than a friend, further than a lover, at the position a real mother should stand.

How did she achieve such perfection? I don’t think she did. I think the dream did it for her.

“I am no longer the Governor,” she said. “That is the price of introspection.”

“Oh,” I said. “Okay, I mean, that’s good, but—”

“I wish to be called Eileen,” said Eileen.

My brief but brutal war against the cringe which rose to my face was a narrow victory for my better nature, but a victory nonetheless, as I kept it contained within the darkest reaches of my sour and soiled gut; Praem fought at my side as my greatest ally, by reminding me to be kind. I would never cringe at a human telling me their name, no matter how silly or archaic or old-fashioned, would I? If the Eye had made a choice, it was hers to make, whatever my own tastes and aesthetic sensibilities.

“O-okay,” I said. “Okay, good. Hello, yes, nice to ... um?”

For a moment I assumed some stealthy skirmisher of unkind emotion had crept onto my expression, because the smile in Eileen’s eyes intensified so much I thought they might literally boggle from her head.

"I know," she said. "It is a pun."

"You ... you know? Then why ... ?"

"You may laugh if you want," she said. "You may point out that it is silly. I would prefer if you did."

"Ummm." I asked Praem for guidance or advice, but she had none. "But ... why?" I managed. "I don't want to offend you or be rude to you. It's your name, if that's what you truly want. I'm sorry I advised you against it before, if it's what your heart truly desires. I'll call you anything you like."

"No," said the Eye — Eileen. "Say it."

"Say what?"

"Say it. Please. Say it."

I hesitated, clearing my throat, my awkwardness so powerful that for a moment I forgot the throbbing pain in my leg. "Eileen sounds kind of like ... 'eye'."

"Yes!" she cried. "Yes, it does."

"And you like that?"

"Very much. I like puns, and homophones, and double meanings. Thinking with writing has taught me that. I like things which mean more than one thing at once, things which look like twins but which are not. English is a very silly language. I like this."

"Ah, well, um." I fought a losing battle against every good-girl impulse I had. "It is a very ... a very silly pun, indeed. I mean, you are a giant eyeball in the sky, after all. 'Eileen' is just too obvious. Everyone will think it's a joke."

"Good," said the Eye. "Iris was a runner up."

I winced. Eileen eye-smiled even harder, as if she was having the time of her life. "Really?" I said. "You're serious."

"Cornelia and Clara come in distant third," she said. "Clara is a poor substitute, not nearly punny enough. Did you know that in Japanese, the word 'eye' is spelled 'me'? This is amusing, but unfortunately in Japanese this word is pronounced ‘may’, which ruins the pun. And it would be very confusing if everybody called me ‘Me’, and ‘May’ is a nice name but it is not a pun in English. Therefore, I have settled on Eileen.”

I puffed out a massive sigh, then shook my head, utterly flummoxed. “Well, Raine is going to be delighted and insufferable about this. That was her suggestion, you know that?”

“Yes. But no. It was my choice. Not hers.”

“True. And Evee ... I have no idea how she’ll react to this. She might be rude about it.”

What was I even saying? Evelyn would take one look at the Governor and either try to kill her, or pass out.

“Reactions,” said Eileen. “I desire those. I would be most disappointed if everybody politely ignored the pun. I have fallen in love with puns and double meanings, and now I myself am also a pun. Eye, and I, and Eileen, am a pun. This is the first step to loving myself.”

I blinked in surprise. “Wow, um. That’s a step further than I expected, and so quickly, too.”

“I am open now,” said Eileen.

“You’re also a lot more talkative. Is that on purpose?”

“I am myself. I!”

“Fair enough.” I sighed, trying to clear my head. The pain was throbbing back upward from my leg. “So, what now?”

Eileen raised her eyes from me and ran her gaze up the concrete cylinder which led back to her office. “We must leave the archives. I have nothing left to do here. We must leave them for good, and return to the hospital, where we can take action, and aid your revolution.”

“Right. Right! I ... wait, if you’ve relinquished your authority, who are we even revolting against?”

Eileen looked back at me, wide-eyed and very intense, as if surprised. “I do not know.”

“Huh, okay, um. Well, with any luck, the dream will sort itself out somehow. Maybe the revolution will win by default now?" I winced and held up my free hand. "Wait, wait a second, we can't just go gallivanting off yet. What about her?"

I pointed past Eileen, indicating the sad framework of the Lozzie Puppet, built from chicken wire and felt fabric and scraps of meat.

Eileen turned and looked. "Her?"

"Yes, her! You made her, do you understand that? You created her, but you left her incomplete, like a parody of life. It's too cruel, far too cruel to leave her like that, unfinished. You made her, she was a 'failure', and then you abandoned her again. You have to take responsibility for her, too. And I don't mean putting her out of her misery! Don't you dare do that. You have to take responsibility."

Eileen just stared and stared and stared at the sad lump of the Lozzie Puppet. Not once did her eyes waver or flicker away, nor even blink. Sweat gathered beneath my armpits and down my back; the stinging, aching, stabbing throb in my left shin intensified in the fog-wrapped silence, with nothing to distract my body and mind. I clenched my teeth; was it time for morphine yet?

Praem told me to wait. Not just yet.

Eileen finally turned back to me. "I will finish her."

A sigh of relief slipped from my throat. "Good, okay—"

"But not right now. We are needed upstairs. My ..." Eileen blinked as if struck dumb; I realised it was the first time I'd seen her blink since she'd finished the manuscript. She took a moment to recover. "My biological child can wait. Your revolution and your sister cannot."

"Biological child?" I echoed, wide-eyed. "Actually no, don't worry, don't try to answer that yet. Yes, you can get back to her later, fine. And, one more thing. I made a promise to a whole group of people, and I'm trying to make sure I keep that promise, and this might be the last chance you and I get to talk like this. You have to release the remains of Alexander Lilburne's cult. Do you understand who they are?"

Eileen stared at me. "No."

"Back in my reality, on Earth, you're in all their heads, all the time. You have to release them. Do you understand?"

Eileen considered this for a moment, eyes locked on me. "I shall write them a letter of marque."

"A ... sorry, pardon?"

"A letter of marque and legitimacy."

I blinked several times, utterly stumped. What on earth would that mean, beyond the metaphor of the dream? Was the Eye going to set them free, or bind them closer? Praem suggested I take this at face value for now. Perhaps it was as much as Eileen could promise from within the framework of the play.

"All right, thank you," I said. "But you have to promise. They're under my protection. If you don't free them, I'll consider it a betrayal."

"I promise," said Eileen.

I let out a sigh, unsure if I should be relieved or confused. "Thank you. Right then, let's get out of here and back upstairs."

"Let's."

Together we made our way back toward the door which opened into the concrete cylinder of the stairwell. Walking was becoming more and more of a challenge for me, even across so small a distance as that; the morphine had almost finished working its way through my bloodstream, metabolised and processed, leaving the wound in my shin raw, exposed to the torture of my own nerves, no matter how carefully wrapped in bandages and gauze. I was afraid that the stomp during the earthquake had popped some of my stitches. The pain crawled down into my sole, piercing every footstep with knife-points, and reaching fingers of barbed wire upward into my knee-joint and thigh, scraping against the inside of my hipbone.

A dozen paces to the door left me shivering and sweating, heaving through my teeth.

"Praem?" I whined. "Now?"

Not yet, she said.

"Nnnnnnnnnhhh," I made a terrible sound. "I can't ... "

Eileen took a brief detour to retrieve Horror's severed head. She picked up the gruesomely animated nurse by the sling of towel about her skull, then rejoined me at the door. Horror twitched her jaw and flexed the muscles of her face, but she was wrapped too tightly with towel to achieve anything, gagged and muffled and blinded.

"I suppose ..." I panted, trying to gather my breath past the pain. "Suppose we can't ... leave her down here ... alone. Who knows what mischief ... she would ... get up to."

"She will assist us," Eileen said.

I pulled a doubtful grimace. "Not so sure ... about that. She represents all the ... worst, most negative impulses ... toward my own history. How can she help us?"

"As a hostage."

"... ah, well. Fair enough."

Eileen opened the door into the stairwell. I had hoped to find it transformed somehow by the power of the dream, into a lift or an escalator, or some other form of ascent which would not invoke walking up twenty seven flights of stairs. But alas, there it was — bare concrete, naked bulbs behind wire mesh, the edge of each step a harsh, hard, unyielding lip of shadowless grey. Going up. For twenty seven flights.

I believe I let out some kind of guttural moan, and not the fun kind, then swung myself over the threshold in exhausted resignation.

Eileen followed, but then paused, her hand lingering on the door handle, staring out into the fog beyond the clearing. Her pink and glowing eyes rested on the rows of shelves deep in the mist, with their millions of books and untold number of stories.

"Eileen?" I croaked. The pain was so bad I had to squint through tears.

"It is difficult to say goodbye," she said.

"But you're not," I blurted out before I could think.

"I'm not?"

"No. No, of course you aren't!" I huffed, my patience wearing thin under the weight of pain besieging my leg. "Leaving the project unfinished, admitting it can never be finished, that doesn't mean you can't ever read any of these books again. It doesn't mean you can't choose to read some, for ... for pleasure, or fun, or for some specific piece of information. It's okay! It's fine! You can come back down here, you know? You're going to have to come back down here, anyway, to finish the Lizzie Puppet. Or did you forget already?"

"Ah," said Eileen. "That is true."

"Good."

"Thank you."

"You're welcome. Now please, shut the door. We should ... we should ... mm. Nn!"

The pain built to a crescendo, rocking up and down inside my leg like a tide of acid and fire. I had to squeeze my eyes shut and grip my crutch to ride the wave. I didn't see Eileen shut the door, but I heard the click of the latch.

When I opened my eyes again, my vision was blurred by a veil of tears. I whined deep in my throat, gritting my teeth and shaking my head from side to side, like an animal with a broken limb, insensible to the reason for my pain.

Eileen stepped past me and stared up the echoing tube of the stairwell. Then she looked at me, then back at the stairs, then back at me again.

"Yes?" I croaked.

"We have a problem."

I tried to laugh, but only sobbed. "Yes," I squeezed out. "Twenty seven flights! I— I doubt I can make it up— one flight— like this, I —"

Praem informed me that four hours had just passed. Praem instructed me to take two pills from the white bottle.

Gasping like a drowning sailor at the choppy surface of the sea, I fumbled inside my yellow blanket and drew out the little white bottle of morphine tablets. My hands were coated with sweat, slipping on the child-safe cap; I hissed with frustration as I tried to align the little notches on the lid — and then lost my grip. The bottle popped from my hands and clattered to the floor, rolling across the concrete with a rattle of pills.

“Nnnnnh!” I whined, choking down my pain with anger, staggering a step forward on my crutch. Bending down was going to be impossible, but I had to—

Eileen scooped up the pill bottle and held it out for me.

“Ah, uh ... thank— thank you,” I croaked, taking the bottle from her outstretched hand.

I stared at the child safety cap for a moment. My hands were slick and shaking. Sweat ran down my face. Claws of pain left great wounds in my nerves.

“I ... I can’t do this alone,” I said.

Eileen offered me her hand. Wordlessly, without request, I gave her the bottle. She popped the lid off and shook two pills into her palm, then replaced the lid and held out the pills. I shook my head and just opened my mouth, feeling more helpless and childlike than I had in years. A dull and slow part of my brain realised that I would never, ever let my real, biological, human mother feed me pills, ever again, at the cost of any indignity, any pain. But this? I did not hesitate.

Eileen placed the pills on my tongue. One, then two, then done.

The pills went down hard and dry. We didn’t have any water, nothing to drink, nothing to ease their passage. But I got them down in one rough swallow, feeling them squeezed down my throat to splash into my stomach.

Eileen pressed the pill bottle back into my hand. I shoved it into my yellow blanket, then stood for a long time with my eyes closed tight, clinging to my crutch, praying to my own bloodstream to flow fast and true.

“It’ll take ... fifteen or twenty minutes ... for that stuff to start working,” I said slowly. “Even then, I don’t know if ... I can walk up those stairs. I’m ... I’m stuck, I ... ”

“Climb aboard,” said Eileen.

I opened my eyes to find her crouched in front of the first step, with her back toward me and her hands waiting to accept my arrival, ready to give me a piggy-back.

“You’re joking,” I rasped.

“I am not joking.”

“You can’t make it up twenty seven flights of stairs with me on your back.”

“I should have carried you from the beginning.”

That stopped all the words in my throat. I was very still for a long moment, poised on the cusp of something which meant both less and more than I felt it did. Praem gently reminded me that there was no other way up those stairs, and that everybody else needed my help. The longer we delayed the worse things might get. The Eye — Eileen — was my ally now, of a sort, though against what I did not yet know. She was not trying to trick me. She would not betray me; if she wanted to, she could defeat me with ease right then. She was merely offering her help.

“All right,” I said eventually, staggering over to Eileen. “All right, just ... just take it as slow as you need.”

“I will stop to rest if I need to.”

“Okay ... ”

Like a very tired little girl at the end of a very long day, I climbed onto Eileen’s back.

I wasn’t sure where to put my crutch, but I recalled handling it to her so she could put it away somewhere safe, perhaps inside her lab coat. Praem tucked herself into my yellow blanket, high up so she would not be squashed. I leaned against Eileen’s back and put my arms around her neck. She took my weight in her hands, braced beneath my thighs; the burning iron cage of my left shin dangled free.

Then she stood up, as if I weighed nothing at all, and walked up the first flight of stairs.

Eileen took the steps slowly and smoothly, so as not to jog my wound. She breathed without difficulty, carrying me without a care. On the first flight I kept my head up, but on the second the effort became too great, and I laid my cheek against her shoulder. She smelled of nothing in particular, except the well-worn fabric of her laboratory coat. By the third flight my eyes grew heavy, lashes dipping. On the fourth, Praem suggested I nap.

I couldn’t truly sleep, of course. Who can sleep in a piggy-back, except the most innocently guileless of real children, in the arms of perfect safety and security? But I came strangely close. The rhythm of Eileen's ascent up from the depths of her own memory lulled me to the liminal edge of slumber.

Carelessly, I murmured: "My real mother never carried me like this."

"I am your real mother," said Eileen.

"My biological mother," I corrected. "You're not my biological mother. You're ... "

Eileen did not argue further. She kept walking, pulling me up, one step after the other, never faltering, never complaining, never straining at my weight.

She felt like a mother, but I didn't say that out loud. I did not have the best relationship with my 'real' mother, even after I had exposed her to the revelatory truth of Maisie; would I ever have a good relationship with Samantha Morell, after she had knowingly or unknowingly done me so much harm? But Eileen — the Eye — was no different. She had hurt me more than I could put into words. Her thoughtless obsession had tortured me in ways I could not express, taken my twin sister from me, and turned any hope of young happiness to ashes in my mouth.

But without her, I would never have met Raine and Evee. I would never have visited the abyss. I would not have the family and comrades and home and life I had built in the ruins of the previous life which never came to be. Would I have never reached beyond the veil of my flesh? Would I have gone my entire life without abyssal transformation? Probably.

And now here I was, cradled against her back, cheek upon her shoulder, eyes closed in safety and security.

Could I forgive the Eye?

I didn't know — and for now, that was okay. I could not allow myself to confront that question right then. Forgiveness or unforgiveness, I needed Eileen's help with the revolution and with cracking open Maisie's prison cell; she was not holding that help hostage beyond a forgiveness I could not — and maybe never would — grant. So we would face the same foe, until this was all over.

But — what foe?

That thought drifted off, as true sleep almost won.

What felt like hours later, Eileen woke me gently. “We’re here.”

“Uhhh?”

I raised my head from her shoulder, blinking bleary eyes against the harsh light. A thick metal door stood before us, set in a concrete wall. We had reached the top landing of the stairwell.

Eileen gently lowered me back to my feet, crouching down so I could find the floor myself. I kept both hands on her back until she passed me my crutch, then she straightened up and helped me wedge the crutch back into position beneath my armpit.

The pain in my left leg was silenced, reduced to a half-heard echo beneath the smothering blankets of morphine in my bloodstream; a strange tremor passed through my leg as I put pressure on that foot, but that was all.

Eileen opened the door to her office and led me back inside.

The Office of the Governor of Cygnet Hospital, Asylum, Prison, and Maximum Security Containment Facility was exactly as we had left it. A wide room with scratchy brown carpet and off-white walls, so well lit that not a single shadow lingered — a habit I now understood, with a pang of sympathy. The room was equipped with two desks, one normal and covered with blank papers, the other a steel monster acting as the root for a tree of monitors which stretched to cover the entire left-hand wall.

Dawn was breaking, beyond the window on the right hand side of the room.

A ruddy orange glow poured down upon the hospital grounds, soaking into the lawns and sinking beneath the lake of gently swaying trees, dying every surface red and dark, as if the world itself was bleeding.

An open wound lay across the forest and the lawns — a track of destruction cut into the landscape.

I stood gaping for a moment. Eileen didn’t seem to care; she crossed to the desk and dumped Horror’s towel-wrapped head onto the surface with a wet and meaty thump. I recovered myself with a deep breath and hurried over to the window, lurching forward on my crutch, flanked between the filing cabinets and glass display cases and the one tall bookshelf.

The window was cold to the touch; dawn would be chill this day. I braced myself against the glass and stared down at the damage.

A long, wide, winding trail had been cut into the woods which surrounded the asylum, as if a herd of elephants had knocked the trees aside and tramped down the trunks to kindling. The damage had exploded out onto the lawns as a series of narrow marks like puncture wounds in the grass, as if massive poles had been plunged into the ground and withdrawn in sequence. Something with a lot of very thin, sharp feet had scurried across the lawns — something much larger than any fully grown and restored Caterpillar.

The damage to the lawns was not isolated, but was accompanied by a chaotic slew of other paths, criss-crossing each other, winding back and forth over the main direction of damage. Some of those additional trails had simply crushed the grass flat and thrown up a lot of mud, but others were clearly the ruts of wheels or tracks, as if a whole squadron of armoured vehicles had been fighting a running battle with some giant monster.

“What on earth?” I hissed.

Whatever had happened, it was now happening on some far side of the asylum, for I couldn’t hear any gunfire or explosions, nor see any stragglers below.

As I concentrated on the damage to the hospital grounds and pressed my ear to the glass, I realised that the Governor’s Office was no longer so silently sound-proofed.

Distant shouts and calls echoed upward from below us, trapped behind walls of brick and steel, though too muffled and far away to make out any words. A sudden deep thump shook the floor several stories down. Running feet, screaming and howling, the banging and smashing of improvised weapons — all of it rose up out of the depths. I strained my ears in fear, listening for the tell-tale firecracker pop-pop-pop of guns, but I heard nothing of the sort. I didn’t know if I should be relived or worried.

“The revolution has started, I assume,” Eileen said.

“Yes, I assumed so too, but what’s—”

I ducked my head and twisted where I stood, hoping to get a better view past the brickwork of the hospital's exterior, to see if I could spot whatever giant creature had left those marks on the landscape.

But, as I did, I finally saw the false sky of the dream once more — the blank and wrinkled surface of the Eye, filling the sky from horizon to horizon, just as it had every moment since we had arrived in this compacted metaphor of Wonderland.

But no longer was the sky the unbroken surface of the underside — the inside, the back-side, while we played at being cornea and vitreous humour down in the dream below.

Mountain ranges of black flesh stood aside, continents of lid flowed beyond their world-spanning length, open on a chasm larger than the universe. The lid was cracked, the halves stood parted; from within shone a silver so deep and dark that it could have swallowed all the oceans of the world and every thought ever born in flesh.

A split, a parting, a crack in an orb from horizon to horizon, a gash in reality, an opening of the way, of knowledge and knowing as the universe itself peeled back and—

The Eye was open.

Staring down at Cygnet Asylum.

I reeled back from the window in ancient fear, with instinctive dread and terror and the mortal horror of being flayed atom by atom. Clutching my chest, panting in pure fight-or-flight reaction, I stared down at the landscape — and required Praem's gentle reminder that the trees were not burning, the grass was not turning to ash, and the air itself was not on fire.

The Eye was open, but it was not observant.

"I ... o-okay," I stammered, then hiccuped twice, painfully. "I mean — r-right. This is a dream, a m-metaphor. I suppose. Okay, it's fine, it's fine! It's safe! Safe ... "

From behind me, Eileen said: "I am looking inward."

I glanced back at her, at her pink eyes framed by blonde hair, the hair in turn framed by the wall of monitors. Every monitor was another chaotic view of the inside or outside of the asylum and hospital, too much confusion to pick out details without heading over there and sitting down in the massive metal swivel-chair. I had unconsciously kept my eyes away from the bank of monitors when we'd entered, for fear of being unable to tear myself apart from my dear Maisie once I spotted her again.

"As long as you don't start melting everything down," I said.

"The project is over," said Eileen. "The archives are closed. Further additions are not required."

I sighed and rubbed at my chest, trying to still the wild racing of my heart. "Okay. Okay! Fine. Forgive me for having trouble accepting it's as simple as that. Seeing you, open, in the sky, does bring back some rather traumatic memories."

"No forgiveness is necessary. No transgression has been made."

I stared at Eileen for a long moment, framed by the flicker and static of her monitors; she stared right back at me, unblinking, bug-eyed, no longer distracted. The sound of distant shouts broke the silence between us, drifting up from the lower floors of the hospital. Far, far away, something clanged, metal against metal. A voice laughed, then cut off as if smothered. A rousing cry like a war chant rose, then fell. From even further afield — beyond the walls — something made an oddly familiar trilling, fluttering noise, like a giant fan had opened somewhere out on the grounds. That noise faded too, leaving us alone once more.

"Thank you," I said slowly. "Right, so, you want to help me. How do we start? How do we do this?" My eyes flicked to the front door of the office. "Is Sevens still ... ?"

"The Director has doubtless departed, in a new direction."

I nodded at the door. "Let's check anyway. Please?"

Eileen walked over to the door. I hobbled a few paces to the side so I could peer past her. She opened it without pause; beyond the door lay an empty corridor of whitewashed walls and linoleum floor, lit by the early crest of dawn breaking through distant windows. No nurses lay spread across the floor. No Sevens strode about in platform heels.

Noise floated up the corridor from somewhere below — shouting and banging, an occasional scream, feet pounding up and down stairs.

I sighed. "Damn. I was hoping she could help us."

"The revolution needed her elsewhere," said Eileen.

She shut the door and turned the latch to secure the bolt.

"You're locking us in?" I asked. "Why?"

Eileen stared at me, without any hint of a smile in her stilled expression. "I am no longer in charge," she said. "I have relinquished my authority. I cannot defend us."

A shudder of realisation climbed up my spine. Eileen was unarmed, no matter what she represented, and she did not seem particularly inclined to martial arts. I was barely able to walk, glued to my crutch, and stuffed with opiate painkillers. Praem was currently in plushie form. If we were caught by nurses out there in the corridors, we'd have no chance.

"We're trapped here," I hissed. "We can't help at all!"

"One is never trapped," said Eileen, with a hint of pride, "if one can but observe."

She walked over to the second desk, beneath the wall of monitors, and stopped by the metal throne, mounted on a ball-and-socket joint set into the floor. She touched the chair with a fingertip so that it spun around to face me, then she gestured an invitation with one hand.

"Be seated."

I almost laughed. "You're joking?"

"I am, yet again, not joking," she said. "Be seated. You will see."

I sighed. "Is that meant to be another pun?"

"It is not a good enough pun," she said. "I must practice further."

I lurched over on my crutch and very carefully sat down on the offered seat. The metal observation chair was gigantic, about three sizes too large for me; I felt like a child queen sitting in her mother's throne, sinking into the plush fabric layered atop the metal and plastic. I cleared my throat awkwardly and lay my crutch across my thighs. At least I was finally off my feet.

Eileen gently turned the chair on the ball-and-socket joint, until I was facing the wall of monitors. I deliberately kept my eyes off the various views, knowing I would get sucked into looking for my friends, or watching Maisie, and might have trouble surfacing again. My heart raced all the same, afraid for my friends and family, for every single one of them, for the joint fate of Lozzie's bespoke revolution.

"Very well then," I said, looking up at Eileen. "What's the plan? What do we do?"

"We will observe."

"Yes, I got that much."

"And then we will intervene."

"How?"

"Through observation."

I frowned at her. "We do have to physically get there first. You do understand that, right? We can't just reach out and do things at a distance. We're going to have to be there. Do you ... "

Eileen was staring at the monitors, eyes flicking back and forth. "There are too many nurses. More than I thought."

"Ah?" I risked a glance at the monitors, just long enough to confirm she was right.

The nurses were all over the place, in every corridor and room, chasing clusters of scared girls or facing down makeshift phalanxes of armed patients. The dawn had not returned them to their human masks; they were stuck now in their night-shift nightmare truth, a myriad of mutations and impossible monsters, flowing up and down the hallways of the Asylum, brandishing syringes and straitjackets.

I shook my head. "This still doesn't make any sense. If you've relinquished your authority, who's in charge of all this? Who's running this now?"

"The Director?" Eileen suggested. She sounded uncertain.

"Sevens, you mean. And no. She broke out, she came to rescue me. She's not doing this." I chewed my lip. "Maybe this whole play really was originally meant to be for you, to show you how much me and my friends all love each other. Why we matter to each other. Why we're ... not like you, I suppose. Maybe that process isn't over. Maybe you need to keep witnessing all this?"

“Mmmmmm,” Eileen hummed, doubtful.

“Yes, right,” I said, trying to convince myself. “That must be it. You’ve turned inward, which is good. But you’ve not yet understood my attachment to my friends and lovers. You need to know that the future is not lonely. You need to know community! That’s what the play is for!” I tried to laugh, then leaned forward and waved at the screens. “You need to see everybody! Here, help me spot Raine and Zheng, let’s start with them, let’s—

Bang!

The door to the Governor’s Office burst open and banged off the wall, lock shattered, hinges bent.

Eileen turned; a touch of her fingertips turned the seat with her, so I was not left craning my neck to see what new horror bore down upon us.

Knights poured in through the ruined doorway — ten of them, black-booted and black-clad in body armour and helmets, their mirrored visors and tight gloves leaving not a scrap of skin showing. They had their big shiny black guns raised, pressed to their shoulders, sweeping the room like in a movie or one of Raine’s video games. Shock gave way to relief — we had our escort!

“Oh!” I almost laughed. “You came to ... pick ... us ... up.”

Relief curdled.

These were not Knights; the resemblance was clear, but the details were wrong. They moved with mechanical precision, more like automatons than my delightfully living Knights —flicking their guns left and right, clicking their heads around like little searchlights. The insignia over each heart was different — where the Knights had borne a patch showing a trio of tentacles impaled on a spike, these strange new arrivals wore a symbol that showed a crimson halo over a crowned head, the face a featureless white void on a field of black.

They finished the sweep with the muzzles of their guns, then lowered the weapons to aim at the floor; I couldn’t help but realise they had never once pointed the weapons at myself, but had gladly threatened Eileen.

“Clear,” one of them said.

It spoke in a machine-voice, clipped and empty, neither masculine nor feminine, nor anything else, buzzing like a computer-generated sound from decades past. There was nothing in there, nothing but empty space.

One of the not-Knights — just armed guards, really, without the Knights' true chivalry — stepped over to the main desk and picked up Horror's towel-wrapped head.

For a moment I thought the worst was happening, and they were going to free her again. But then the Empty Guard spoke into a radio attached to the uniform's shoulder.

"Targets one and two secured, Ma'am," said that robotic voice.

I exploded.

"Who?!" I shouted, gesticulating with both hands, almost knocking my crutch to the floor. Praem peered out of my yellow blanket and tried to get me to calm down, but I politely refused her. Three of the guards flinched, but they didn't point guns at me; I was beyond caring. "Who could you possibly be talking to?! Who's in charge of you lot? There can't be anybody! Another head nurse?! Who?"

The Empty Guard spoke into the radio again: "Target one is vocalising. Yes Ma'am. Understood. Not to be harmed. Understood. Yes M'am."

I glanced at Eileen. She was staring at the guards with as much surprise as me. "Eileen!" I said. "There isn't another part of your ego out there or something?"

"No," she said. "I do not know what—"

The Empty Guard spoke again: "The ex-Governor is also here. Orders?" A pause. "Understood. Yes Ma'am. Understood."

"Who can you possibly be talking to!?" I yelled again. "This is absurd!"

The Empty Guard lowered the radio and lifted the gun.

The other nine all followed their leader.

All ten Empty Guards aimed at Eileen.

"Eliminate the target."

bedlam boundary – 24.29

Ten black barrels of ten black guns — sharp little holes bitten out of reality's hide; the flesh-piercing, blood-sucking, brain-drinking mouth-parts of ten beetle-backed insects, all ten open wide as whirlpools in the great dark ocean of the mind, surfaces slick with oil and grease and corrosive mucus, eager and quivering with the promise of punctured lungs and ruptured hearts and an end to the dream.

Ten sets of squared shoulders. Ten pairs of gloved hands. Ten of my own wide-eyed face, reflected in ten mirrored visors. Ten safeties off, ten magazines locked, ten sights zeroed on unprotected flesh. Ten Empty Guards, ten false Knights, ten intruders commanded by one unseen voice, muffled by radio static and the distance of the void.

Ten trigger fingers, tightening on ten shots; ten bullets awaiting the strike of ten hammers; ten chances to fail, ten chances to die.

Ten guns all aimed at Eileen.

And me, with two hands, one body, and without my tentacles.

"No!" I screamed, and hurled myself off the throne.

'Hurled' is perhaps too grandiose a word for what I actually achieved — the ungainly slump of a morphine-addled waif falling sideways out of an overgrown swivel-chair, bloodstream fogged with opiate dreams, crutch sliding off my thighs, left leg reduced to dead weight, fingers clawing at empty air. But that was how it felt. A heroic lunge. A leap of faith. Jumping in front of a bullet.

This was all a dream, of course. A dream and a play, a metaphor for Wonderland and the Eye's mind, a stage wrought from hyperdimensional mathematics, painted with a heady stew of shared trauma, buried history, and allegorical obscenity. Would a stage-prop bullet truly slay Eileen? Could a slug of explosive-accelerated lead leave the tiniest pinprick upon the Eye? Probably not, no. Eileen's true body lay spread out across the sky, bigger than a gas giant, more dense than a black hole, unassailable by anything smaller than a supernova or an act of some unseen god beyond the stage.

But she'd come so far in these last four hours. She had spoken, and written, and seen, and grown, in a way I gathered she never had before. I had shepherded her into true insight.

What would it mean to lose her now? Would she forget everything, like the parting mists of a dream? Would 'Eileen' and all she had experienced cease to exist? Would the Eye resume her blind observation, without memory of carrying me on her back?

Before that prospect, all my bitterness counted for nothing.

So I floundered sideways and tumbled out of the observation throne. I tackled Eileen from the side, bunching my fists in her laboratory coat, desperate to interpose myself between the guns of the Empty Guards and Eileen's unprotected flesh — the flesh which had carried me and borne me upward from the depths of the archives, only moments earlier. Part of me believed it was a calculated risk; the Guard who had spoken into the radio had said I was 'not to be harmed'. Eileen's only chance was for me to put myself in harm's way, and pray that the Empty Guards' orders were stiffer than their triggers.

I shouted some incoherent babble — don't shoot, don't shoot!

Like we were in an old western, or a noir detective story, and the posse or the pigs would put up their guns at the cry of a young damsel.

But we were not. We were in a horror story.

Eileen did her best to catch me, but my clumsy heroics had caught her by surprise. Praem tried to help, but she was only a plushie, without true strength in those soft little arms. I landed very badly indeed. My injured leg smacked against the side of the chair, then slammed to the floor; the pain burst morphine's bonds, knocking wind and sight and sense straight out of me. My crutch slipped forward and jabbed me in the gut so hard I almost vomited, feeling my intestines and organs pushed aside and warped out of shape; if this had happened out in reality, that would be a trip to the hospital, with internal bleeding, or worse.

Crumpled on the floor, wheezing for breath, blinded by tears, clutching my guts — I realised that the Empty Guards had not yet opened fire.

My fall had bought Eileen a second or two's reprieve, as I had passed in front of her.

I summoned more resolve than I believed I possessed, and reared up from where I had fallen, reaching for Eileen's front, bunching great fistfuls of brown jumper and lab coat, to haul myself up. Things tore inside my guts, but I pulled, I had to shield her from—

Bang-bang! Bang! Bang-bang-bang! Bang-bang!

Eight shots rang out, deafening booms in the close confines of the Governor's Office.

I screamed with an emotion I'd never felt before — desperate failure, utter desolation, hope terminated by blood-soaked lead and unfeeling hands. I slipped downward and slumped helpless on the floor, powerless to stop what had happened, tiny and beaten before this bland institutional violence.

I think I wailed; I wasn't sure, because my ears were still ringing.

Then, eight matching clatter-clank-rattle noises followed the gunshots, suspiciously like the sound of eight heavy, armoured bodies crashing to the floor.

Gasping for breath, with strings of bile hanging from my lips, my leg a vice of agony, and my insides about to be outsides, I grabbed a corner of my yellow blanket and raked it across my eyes, clearing tears of pain from my sight.

Eileen was still standing, right there in front of me, mercifully unpunctured by bullet holes. Her pink-glowing eyes were thrown extra wide with fresh surprise.

“—wha-what—” I wheezed.

Eileen looked down at me. “We have been spared, so do not go spare. There is no spare of you.”

I coughed, and tasted blood in the back of my throat. The pain throbbed like black shadows in my peripheral vision. “S’not— the time for ... puns.”

“This is the best time for puns.”

I coughed again, wheezing for breath.

“Thank you for jumping in front of me,” Eileen said. “I should have done the same for you.”

Slumped on the floor, cradling my belly, drooling from pain-slack lips, I asked Praem for help. She assisted, and together we turned to look at the massacre behind us.

Eight of the ten Empty Guards lay on the floor. Some had fallen straight out with their limbs spread eagle, like pole-axed cartoon characters. Others had crumpled in awkward twitching heaps, armoured bodies tangled in their own black-clad limbs, guns pinned beneath chests and bullet-proof vests, legs twisted backward with the weight of their collapse. Each Guard had been felled with a single head shot, each helmet breached at side or rear, or shot through the shattered and broken visor. Dark tarry puddles spread outward from the fresh corpses, soaking into the brown carpet, ruining the Governor’s office forever; but the air did not stink with that unmistakable iron tang of fresh-spilled gore. Instead the room smelled like a garage. The Empty Guards were not bleeding — they were leaking machine oil.

Some of the more explosive head shots revealed slivers of plastic and chrome instead of skull and bone. In place of brains and meat lay broken circuit boards and burst vacuum tubes, oozing with arteries of wire and pipe, smoking and sparking like damaged computers on the bridge of a fanciful starship.

Robots. The Empty Guards were robots.

And two of them had saved us.

Two of the Guards still stood astride the wreckage of the death squad — feet braced wide, weapons flicking back and forth over the bodies. Twin streamers of smoke rose from the barrels of their submachine guns.

Eileen and I said nothing, both staring with shock; Praem did what she could to get me sat up properly and help clear my airways. I still tasted blood, and plenty of it.

Our pair of inexplicable saviours swept their guns back and forth across the corpses until they were satisfied. One of them gently kicked a couple of the bodies, checking for survivors. After a moment they nodded to each other, then lowered their weapons and straightened up. I realised these two were not like the other Guards — they did not move with the same robotic, boxy, halting motions, but flowed with a loose, easy, quick muscularity. They were slightly taller than the other Guards as well, and their matching black uniforms lacked some of the details shared by the ones lying dead on the floor. They had no radios on their shoulders, no unit patches over their hearts, and their visors were dull grey rather than mirrored silver.

They flicked the safety on their guns, then slung the weapons over their bellies. Then they reached up in unison and removed their helmets.

Twin waterfalls of long white hair spilled forth, framing twin faces of copper-brown skin, with high cheekbones, bold noses, and wide, expressive mouths. Two pairs of deep purple eyes were set in steely expressions, full of suppressed passion, flushed with post-combat high, wide and alert and aware, both darting about the room one last time before settling forward, at rest, upon me.

Two helmets were clasped to two belts, and a pair of twins stood revealed.

“Heather,” one of them said — echoed instantly by the other: “Heather.”

I had never seen these people before, in reality or dreams or Outside or anywhere. There was only one logical conclusion.

“ ... Zalu, Xiyu?” I wheezed.

The twins — the Lilies, the plant-girls from Outside, the twin sisters Xiyuol’tok-al and Zalui’yel-tul, identical this time in their new dream-guises — nodded in exact unison, then glanced at each other with mirrored frowns.

“Yes, it’s—” “—us. But this is—” “—weird. Hm, it really is. We’re even finishing—” “—each other’s sentences. Oh, damn, I don’t—” “—like this.”

The twins spoke different parts of the same single sentence. Even their voices were identical, the same pitch of spiced honey poured over charred granite.

“Wait, wait,” I said, still wheezing, still struggling for breath. “What — how—”

The Lilies turned to me again. “How did you know—” “—it was us?”

“ ... uh ... uhh ... ” I wiped a string of drool from my lips; my hand came away smeared with blood. “Two ... two identical girls, who I’ve never ... never seen before? Who else would it be?”

“Fair—” “—enough. That does—” “—make sense.”

The identical twins glanced at each other with another pair of mirrored frowns.

“This isn’t—” “—going to—” “—work. One of us has to—” “—stop talking. You stop.” “No, you. No—” “—I said you—”

“Twins!” said Eileen.

The Lilies stopped. They turned their frowns upon Eileen.

“Twins,” Eileen repeated. “Hello. You are twins. Or you are the same one person, doubled into two, but still existing as one. How wonderful. How beautiful. What does it feel like?”

Twin hands twitched around the grips of twin guns. Twin brows furrowed in matching suspicion.

“Thank you for saving us,” said Eileen. “I have only just begun to think clearly, and bullets would clog my thinking. I am alive! I am not shot. This is capital, to avoid capital punishment.”

Twin purple eyes dipped down to me in identical silent question.

“She’s— on my— side. Long story.” I heaved for breath. “Can you two just— give me a second? I’m not— not— can’t think—”

“Under—” “—stood, Heather,” said the twins. “Take all the—” “—time you need. We’ll secure—” “—the room.”

“Help—” I groped for my mother’s — no, for Eileen’s hand. “Help me— back into the chair, please?”

Eileen handled me with great care. She took charge of my crutch, then lifted me by the arms, careful not to put any weight on my legs or pressure on my belly. She gently deposited me back into the throne of chrome and plastic. I felt as if I had never sat anywhere so comfortable, so perfectly shaped to accept my bruised and battered body. I sank into the plush welcome. Praem helped by smoothing my yellow blanket down over my back and easing the iron maiden of my left shin up and onto the chair.

For a long moment I just sat there, sunk deep into the throne, trying to get my breath back, waiting for the morphine to resume its own tender magic. The taste of blood lingered in my mouth. My guts quivered with every breath. I stared at the left leg of my pajama bottoms, certain that I must have burst at least one or two of my stitches, waiting for the blood to start seeping through the fabric.

“Do you need medical attention?” Eileen asked.

Praem told her no, I was not in any danger. But I needed to rest. Damage had been done.

The Twins did not stand idle as I recovered. They really did ‘secure the room’. One of them closed the door, though it wouldn’t stay shut with the damaged hinges, so she dragged a filing cabinet in front of it, to block the entry of any further undetected interruptions. The other Lily checked the bodies of the Empty Guards, rolling them over and stripping their weapons and spare ammunition. In a couple of minutes she had eight additional guns and a big stack of shiny black magazines piled up on the Governor’s desk. The Twin who had closed the door went to the window and peered left and right, then frowned up at the sky — at the Eye, open in the firmament. The other one pointed at the metal door to the archives and snapped a question for Eileen: “Where does that lead?”

“The archives,” said Eileen. “It is a dead end.”

“Might want to grab her,” I wheezed.

Both Twins stared at me. Those purple eyes were so intense. Every motion of their bodies was like watching a predatory big cat stalking around the room.

“Who are you—” “—talking about?” they asked in unison.

I gestured at the floor. “That. Her.”

“... ah. We must—” “— have missed that. Thank—” “—you, Heather.”

One of the twins stepped quickly over to the towel-wrapped bundle still twitching and writhing on the floor, where it had fallen from the grip of one of the guards.

She lifted Horror’s severed head, then lifted her eyebrows. “Is this what—” “—I think it is?”

“Horror, yes. Don’t unwrap her, please. Unless you’re going to interrogate her or something. And I wouldn’t try that either, she’s not very useful.”

The Twin dumped Horror’s head back on the desk, where it belonged.

“You really—” “—did take her head—” “—off. Wow. Well done, Heather. Well—” “—done indeed.”

“Wasn’t me,” I wheezed. “Was Twil.”

“Ah. Even—” “—better.” “We did—” “—hope she would—” “—find our—” “—brief presence—” “—useful. Did—” “—she?”

Listening to the pair of them was dizzying. They were not merely finishing each others’ sentences, they were stopping and starting with split-second precision, like one mind in two bodies. Processing their speech would have taxed my mind at the best of times, let alone when my back teeth were floating in morphine, my left leg was going to fall off, my guts were recovering from a sledgehammer blow, and I was coming down from the adrenaline high of almost getting shot.

I held up a weak hand. “Sorry, Zalu, Xiyu, I can’t tell you two apart, not like this. It’s very disorienting. And you’re getting worse. More fragmented the more you speak.

The Twins glanced at each other with a strictly irritated look again. “You-” “have to—” “—stop. Let—” “—me do—” “—the—” “—speaking.”

I didn’t have the energy to roll my eyes.

Eileen said: “This is beautiful. Please keep talking.”

I sighed. “For you, perhaps. Please, you two, isn’t there a way to ... separate you out a bit?”

The Lilies both looked at me. “Technically—” “—no. This time—” “—we’re the same—” “—single person. But—” “—maybe we can—” “—improvise. Things are—” “—already breaking—” “—down, after all. We may—” “—as well—” “—take advantage.”

Both Twins reached into the pockets and pouches of their matching bulletproof vests, and withdrew matching black hair ties. With a swish of both hands and a flick of quickly gathered long white hair, the Lily on the right pulled her snowy mane into a loose ponytail. The Lily on the left watched her sister, then repeated the motion, arranging her hair in a side-ponytail. One back, one side. That was enough to tell them apart, for now.

“Better?” one of them said.

I almost laughed. “Tactical hair ties, really? I mean, yes, good idea, but—”

“Zalu,” said the rear-ponytail twin, pointing at herself with two fingers.

“Xiyu,” confirmed Xiyu, with her side-tail.

I sighed. “Right. Thank you. Are you differentiated now?”

Zalu and Xiyu looked at each other.

“Operation successful,” said Zalu.

“Confirmed,” said Xiyu. “Mission complete.”

Eileen said: “Distinction has been introduced, yet the similarities remain unblurred. This continues to be very delightful.”

“You two were beautiful, earlier, by the way,” I told them. “When you showed us your true forms, when we were all fighting Horror, out in the rain. I just wanted to tell you that, in case we never get another chance to talk like this. You were incredibly beautiful.”

Zalu laughed softly. Xiyu raised her eyebrows in polite surprise.

“I’m serious,” I said.

“And I,” said Zalu, “will never truly understand you human beings. But thank you.”

“Who are you two inhabiting this time?” I asked. I nodded down at the machine-corpses of the other guards. “You’re not one of those. I thought you had to insert yourselves into the dream, take the place of somebody already present, or something like that?”

Zalu nodded. Xiyu looked grave. Zalu said: “In the normal course of operations, yes. Reinsertion would have taken much longer. But we ran into your fiancée. She got us straight to the front. Metaphorical airdrop. Unpleasant, but this was an emergency.”

“... you mean Sevens?”

“Yes. Seven Shades of Sunlight. She outranks us, even though she’s from a different outfit. Couldn’t turn down those orders. She arranged equipment and arms, and used her own transport to get us here.”

I felt like my leg pain was transforming into a headache. “You two are talking like ... I don’t know, like characters from a shooting game.”

“It’s part of the role,” said Xiyu. “It’s efficient, but showy at the same time. Very odd. But not our place to question.”

“We can’t drop the lingo entirely,” said Zalu. “Sorry.”

“But who are you?”

The Lilies glanced at each other. Zalu answered. “Identity unknown. We’re not locals this time, not from the dream. We think we’re some kind of composite, partly from a book Sevens has read, partly from a video game familiar to Raine. This kind of spec-ops assignment is not our usual haunt, but Sevens needed an operative proficient in small arms, CQC, infiltration, subterfuge, sabotage, snake eating, and assassination. She needed somebody to slip in among the guards. Sent us to help you.”

Both Lilies hefted their submachine guns, racking slides and flicking switches and making the guns go click-click-click, all in perfect unison with each other. They finished with a boot-stop attention-stand and a quick pair of salutes.

“... okay,” I managed. “And where is Sevens now?”

“Unknown. Our orders were destroyed after reading. She is occupied in another theatre.”

“Ah!” Eileen gasped. “Oh. Beautiful.”

The Twins both scowled at her.

I sighed and shook my head. The pain was making it almost impossible to think clearly. The morphine did not appear to be working the same as before. My leg burned like a hot piece of metal had been inserted beneath my skin, and my guts felt like I’d been run over by a bus driven by an entire troop of gorillas. My eyes kept watering. Every time I breathed I could taste blood.

I nodded down at the Empty Guards — the machine corpses, the absurd robots with their circuit-board brains and vacuum-tube eyes. “What are they, then?”

“Enemy unknown,” Xiyu answered. “We slipped in alongside them, in the rear of the formation, following Sevens’ orders.”

Zalu carried on: “They’re not too smart, didn’t realise we were tagging along, not until we broke cover.”

“Sloppy discipline.”

“Bad officers.”

“Yes.”

Zalu and Xiyu glanced at each other again. Zalu said, “I’m starting to like this, sister. The white hair suits you.”

“The stature suits you, too, sister.”

“Nice muscles, beneath that armour.”

“Want to compare?”

“Not on the battlefield.”

“We’d have to strip.”

“Very unsafe.”

“Not sanctioned.”

“Excuse me,” I croaked. The Twins looked at me again. I gestured at the corpses of the Empty Guards a second time. “Where did they come from, then? Who sent them? Who’s in charge of the asylum now?”

Zalu eyed the Governor. “Her?”

I shook my head. “No, no, she’s not in charge anymore. Eileen has —”

“Eileen?” echoed Xiyu. Her purple eyes went wide with shock.

“Yes,” I sighed. “Eileen, it’s—”

Zalu laughed — a single hard bark. “A new designation? That’s absurd.”

“Yes!” Eileen said, voice brimming with pleasure. “It is absurd. Do you like it?”

Zalu and Xiyu eyed each other, unsure how to respond, their warrior-goddess appearance undercut by deep bafflement. Eileen beamed without actually smiling, her pink eyes burning in her face, hands deep in the pockets of her laboratory coat.

“She’s gotten into puns and homophones,” I said. “Listen, it’s a really long story to tell right now. The short version is that I finally got her to turn her gaze inward. She’s done some introspection. She’s on my side.”

“Yeah,” said Zalu, fingers flexing on the grip of her weapon. “We did notice the big peeper outdoors is open, but the world is still intact. Funny, that.”

“Did you feel the earthquake?” I asked.

Zalu and Xiyu shook their heads in unison, ponytails swaying. Zalu said, “No quake up here, ma’am.”

“Could have happened before we arrived,” said Xiyu.

“Don’t see any physical evidence though.”

“True, sister.”

“True.”

“Ah, hm,” I hummed, realising they had a good point. Down in the archives the earthquake had shaken books from shelves and cracked the concrete of the stairwell, but up here in the Governor’s office nothing seemed to have been knocked out of place. “That’s ... odd.”

I struggled to think through the pain. Had the earthquake been pure analogy, then? Was the centre of the Eye’s mind isolated from this metaphorical hospital?

“Sorry, Heather,” said Zalu. She pointed at Eileen. “But this is weirder.”

“She’s not observing any more,” I said. “For the purposes of the dream, she’s on my side. She wants to assist with the revolution, and she’s going to open the Box, so I can get to Maisie.”

“Your twin sister, right. The main mission target. And she’s going to assist with that now?”

“Yes.”

Xiyu snorted. "That's some battlefield conversion."

"Love can bloom," added Zalu.

I sighed a very big and exhausted sigh; the Lilies were easier to tell apart now, but some instinct told me they were descending even further in video game military slang. I said, "I'm pretty sure I had to rewrite part of the play to achieve this, but yes, it's real. She's on my side."

Zalu and Xiyu both stared at Eileen — the ex-Governor, the ego of the Eye, the avatar walking beneath her own gaze. Eileen stared back at them, intense and wide-eyed.

"I saw you two once before," she said after a moment. "I remember you both. You were very fast and very clever. And very green, but also ... very green."

Zalu sighed and closed her eyes. Xiyu winced.

"I am sorry," said Eileen. "Your language does not have many puns, and we are not currently speaking it, so I was forced to make a pun in English. But it was a bad pun. That was painful."

"You don't say," said Xiyu.

Zalu thumbed at Eileen. "Is this just what she's like now? Old people pun jokes?"

"She's still learning," I said, feeling oddly protective of Eileen's efforts. "Look, isn't it better than before? She's not burning this dream to ash or anything. This is a good thing."

Zalu nodded, sharp and smart. "On the battlefield, sure. But this doesn't mean we're sticking around afterward to see what happens when she finally lets go, out in reality."

"Thank you," I said. "I didn't say it before, but thank you for coming back, for saving me. Saving us. You had no obligation to do this. You didn't have to save us the first time either. Thank you both."

"We cannot take full credit," said Zalu.

"Ah?"

Xiyu pointed at the corpses on the floor. "The automatic guards paused when you gave them an order. That gave us an opening to neutralise them.”

I squinted through the pain. “I ... they did what, sorry?”

Zalu echoed her sister. “The automatic guards held their fire when you told them not to shoot.”

My head throbbed with increasing pain. My guts roiled, still threatening me with a lap full of sick. The burning in my leg still absorbed so much of my mental processing. I felt like I was being torn in two; I couldn’t think. The guards had obeyed me? Why?

“Um,” I managed. “Thank you regardless. Thank you.”

Zalu and Xiyu both nodded, curt and simple.

Zalu said, “We needed to render our support for this operation. And we got conscripted by Seven Shades of Sunlight.”

Xiyu suddenly rocked back on her heels. “We’ve carried out our orders, sister. Technically we could be off now.”

“No we can’t. Seven Shades would have our heads for dereliction of duty.”

“True, sister.”

“What’s the SOP, then?”

“Stay here, guard Heather, wait for reinforcements.”

“Ummm, excuse me?” I said, interrupting the pseudo-tactical chatter. “But I don’t think that’s an option any more.”

Both Twins looked down at me. Xiyu said: “We know better than you do, Heather. We’re in the role for this, remember? We’re the professionals here, you’re a civvy in need of protection. Let us worry about the combat part. You just do what you gotta do, we’ll look after you.”

I frowned, hissing with effort. “Pardon me if I’m asking an obvious question.” I gestured at the dead Guards again. “But what happens when they don’t ‘report back’, or whatever they’re supposed to do?”

Zalu and Xiyu looked down at the dead Guards.

“Oh.”

“Hmmmmm.”

“That’s a good point.”

“They’ll be missed shortly.”

“When they don’t make their report.”

“And then another team will be sent out to finish the mission. Do we consider that probable?”

“Very likely, sister.”

“And we’ll be barricaded in here.”

“Like sitting ducks. Fish in a barrel. A tree on a bluff.”

“Can we hold that door with just two of us?”

“Negative. They’ll bring up heavier fire-power.”

“But they don’t want to hurt Heather. They wouldn’t risk doing that.”

“Can we use her as protection?”

“Negative. Seven Shades would never accept that.”

“True, sister.”

“True.”

“How about if we arm the Governor too, and retreat past that other door? Can we hold out until reinforcements?”

“What kind of reinforcements are en-route?”

“Good question.”

“We don’t know.”

The Lilies ceased their rapid-fire chatter and looked back up at me, in perfect unison. I felt dizzy.

“... well?” I said. “Do you agree with me now?”

“We do,” said Zalu. “Sorry, Heather. We’re not really special operations soldiers, we’re just playing the role. We missed that detail. We might miss other details too. You’ll have to let us know if you notice anything we don’t, ma’am.”

Xiyu asked, “Are we placing ourselves under Heather’s command?”

“Do you have a better idea, sister?”

“We could leave the dream.”

“We could.”

“And Seven Shades of Sunlight would hunt us down for gross insubordination.”

“We’d be court martialed.”

“Dragged before a tribunal.”

“Tried in the Hague.”

“What’s the Hague?”

“No idea.”

Both Lilies turned to me again. “Ma’am.” “Ma’am.”

“Um ... ” I blinked.

Zalu nodded — past me, at the wall of monitors to my rear.

“Ma’am, we need intel on the positions of friendlies, hostiles, and possible reinforcements. Can you interpret that data for us? We can’t understand a lick of it. Not in our pay grade.”

My head felt like it was splitting in two. The pain wasn’t going away, wasn’t ebbing, wasn’t flowing out of me. The observation throne felt massive compared to my battered, shrunken form. I almost croaked an affirmative, almost said yes, almost started to turn and look at the monitors. Because that would be so much easier than facing whatever had gone wrong here — to stare into those infinite views, that perfect omniscient observation, and lose the pain of my body in the sight of others. I started to turn, to seek solace, to stop thinking and start—

Praem said no.

I began to argue with her, but she put her foot down and held me steady. I pointed out that I had looked at those monitors only a few minutes ago, had I not? And I had come away fine, I had not gotten stuck or trapped, I was more than capable of exerting self control, and I was—

Praem said I was not all here. Praem said she was doing what she could. Praem said she could not anchor me against that impulse, with so little of me to hold onto.

I asked her what she meant. She couldn't answer in a way that made any sense.

"Praem?" I croaked.

"Hm," grunted Xiyu. "I don't believe Heather is capable of intelligence assistance right now." She looked at Eileen. "What about you?"

Eileen turned and stared at the wall of monitors to my rear; a flickering of infinite views was reflected in her pink eyeballs for a moment. Then she turned back.

"I cannot observe as I used to," she said. "A small price."

"Tch," Zalu tutted. "Then we can only stay here, bunker down, reinforce the position. Maybe we can retreat into your 'archives'."

"We require an escort," said Eileen. "Heather has made it clear to me that we must assist the others here, but I have relinquished my authority, and cannot protect her from nurses or others. Please escort us."

Zalu looked doubtful. Xiyu gestured at the pile of firearms on the desk. "You've got more than enough bang here. You're going to have to protect yourself, too."

Eileen transferred her gaze to the shiny black metal and matte black plastic of the guns. She stared and stared and stared, utterly still, without even blinking. Distant sounds of shouting and fighting filtered up from the lower floors of the hospital.

Eventually Eileen said: "I do not know how to use those. Please escort us."

Zalu sighed. "I can teach you. Quickly enough to—"

"I do not wish to know how to use those. Heather cannot use one either, because her leg is very injured, and if we are to venture forth, I must carry her on my back. Please escort us."

Zalu said: "Without intel, we don't know where we're going, or where our allies stand. We can't just—"

"Please escort us," Eileen repeated.

Praem gently suggested that I interrupt this debate, because the whole thing was pointless. We could not stay here in the office, nor could we go blundering about the hospital hallways without information.

But I wasn't paying attention. I was fighting against the pain, and trying to think.

"The genre is collapsing," I muttered.

Eileen and the Lilies stopped talking. One of the Lilies said, "Heather?"

I looked up into twin pairs of dark purple eyes and twinned ponytails of white hair. Eileen watched me too, listening closely.

"The genre," I repeated, struggling to fit the pieces together. "The dream has ... or had, a genre, but it's getting all confused. When we defeated Horror, we did so by letting Twil pull off her head, in full werewolf mode. That changed the 'genre' of the play, changed the dream. It made it into a proper horror story, more directly, or changed the nature of the horror, I'm not sure which. My leg wound went from a scratch to a deep-tissue injury. The whole logic of the place shifted slightly. But this." I gestured at the dead robot guards. "Android security guards? You two? The battle outdoors, whatever was going on out there — do you two know what that was?" Both twins shook their heads. "Well, my point is, all of this stuff doesn't fit. The genre has shifted again."

Zalu said, "The dream is growing thin."

"... excuse me?"

"Getting thin. It's not collapsing or ending, but the logic is all over the place, you're correct. Restrictions have been lifted. Rules of engagement have been abandoned."

"Is that ... good? Or bad?"

"Unknown," said Zalu.

I gnawed on my bottom lip.

Without the Eye as Governor or Sevens as Director, the dream had become un-anchored, like a story without an author, a play with no script, a dream turned independent of the dreamer, into a jumble of signs and symbols all fighting against each other. Lozzie's revolution was in full swing out there, trying to fill the power vacuum, but she had not yet won. Cygnet Hospital was not yet ours.

The asylum was still in flux. Right then it belonged to nobody.

"The centre cannot hold," I murmured. "Mere anarchy is loosed upon the world."

The familiar old poetry brought clarity to my mind. The pain ebbed back, at long last. Suddenly I felt more like myself again.

"Pardon?" said one of the twins.

"Nothing," I answered without looking up, then gestured at the machine-corpses on the floor. "I think these people— these robots, whatever they are, I think whoever sent them is trying to re-establish control of the dream." I sighed. "Oh, I do wish Eevee were here, she'd understand this so much better than I, she was always the one with a head for strategy. Nobody's in charge anymore. Somebody else is trying to step in, now the Governor is no longer the Governor."

"Who?" said Eileen.

I shrugged. "I haven't the foggiest."

"Here," said Xiyu. "Take a look at this."

She reached down and pulled the unit patch off the nearest machine-corpse, then held it out so I could see; it was stick-on, velcro-backed, easily detachable. I couldn't very well get up and accept the patch myself, so Praem went for me, and returned the patch to my waiting hand.

"Thank you, Praem," I murmured.

The patch itself was well-made, a precise piece of craft work in fabric and stitching, stiff and heavy and well-rendered, without a thread out of place. The insignia showed a faceless white head on a black background; the head was crowned in white and haloed in red, as if both royal and divine together in one being.

The face seemed oddly familiar despite the total lack of features, the absence of hair or ears or any form of identification. The crowned head could have been anybody, or nobody at all, a mere allegory for an ideal leader. Yet I found that silhouette so very familiar, as if I had seen it a million times before.

I reached out and stroked the woman's face with a fingertip.

Woman? How did I know that?

“Ummmm,” said one of the Lilies. “Heather, Ma’am, who was that just now?”

“Hm?” I looked up to find Zalu and Xiyu both staring at Praem, who was now tucked neatly back into the front of my yellow blanket. “Oh! I’m sorry, did she surprise you? This is Praem. She’s my ... surrogate ... daughter, I guess? Yes, let’s go with that.”

“Heather, that’s a plushie,” said Xiyu.

Praem told Xiyu that was true. Xiyu choked on her next words. Zalu sighed, and said, “Yeah, restrictions lifted, just like I said. Heather, do you make anything of that patch? Recognise the insignia?”

I shook my head, then returned my gaze to the crowned and haloed face, sinking back into the observation throne as I felt my eyes sinking into the symbol.

“Why is the face blank?” I murmured. “It’s like a ... like a mirror, or a ... ”

One of the Lilies said, “Miss Eileen, I need you to answer a question. Are you certain there’s no other part of you, perhaps trying to take charge?”

“I am only two,” said Eileen. “And really we are both one, so no, there is no other one of us two, only we two, I and I. And I have already surrendered my command, so there is nothing more to retreat from.”

A sigh. “Are you still trying to pun?”

“Yes.”

“You’re not doing a very good job of it.”

“I’m experimenting. And I am very stressed right now. I apologise for the shortcoming. I will improve.”

The more I stared at that faceless head with crown and halo, the less I was plagued by pain in both leg and gut. My own head began to clear. My mind woke up, thinking faster and faster. Within seconds I felt no longer like a pain-wracked blob of flesh writhing in a chair or sprawled on the floor. Whoever had sent these Empty Guards to kill Eileen, I would find her and hunt her down. I was smart and swift and capable, leg wound or no. Lozzie and the others were fighting for a revolution, and I would join them shortly — but my first foe was here, behind the stage.

The faceless head seemed almost allegorical, as if it wasn't a face at all, but an echo of something else, which only appeared as a face inside this dream. It was like a magic eye picture that I couldn't quite solve, depicting something I knew with more intimacy than anything else in the world.

"It's really weird, talking to you," one of the twins was saying.

"Yes," said Eileen. "It is strange for me too, for you have all been strangers for far too long."

"We don't like you," said one Lily. "Me and my sister here, we're not gonna kiss and make up with you, not like Heather has. All you did was kidnap us and fuck us up."

The other sister hummed: "Mmm. Not entirely true, sister. Technically she also extended our lifespans, and taught us how to reach beyond the limits of our own species. Right?"

A big sigh. "Right. Whatever. Discuss this later."

The colours of the insignia were a bit silly — a bit 'edgy', as Raine might have put it. Black and white and red was so very supervillain, but a little part of me thought it was kind of 'cool', if a bit over the top. Not the kind of thing I would admit in front of others; good girls didn't dress up in black and red and cackle about their evil plans, but Raine would probably think I looked wonderful in spandex and a mask. I hadn't liked the patch worn by the actual Knights, which had depicted tentacles impaled on a spike. But this emblem was acceptable to some part of me. This symbol felt right, perhaps only in private.

I lowered the patch over my own heart, as an experiment. The pain was almost gone. My head was so clear. Perhaps if I held the patch there, I would remain coherent enough to turn and look at the screens and monitors. Perhaps if I affixed the patch to my chest, I would be able to 'take command' of Zalu and Xiyu in their military guises. Perhaps if—Praem gently moved my hand — and the patch — away from my heart.

I blinked several times, eyes filling with tears; the pain came throbbing back.

“Oh. That was ... odd,” I muttered. “Hm.”

“Heather?” said one of the Lilies.

Praem reminded me of my resolve. We still needed a solution.

I glanced up, not at the Lilies and Eileen, but at the machine-bodies on the floor and the patches on their uniforms. If the owner of the blank face was the one they served, then perhaps I could make contact. Perhaps I could find an answer.

Each of the corpses had a radio strapped to the shoulder — a little device held on by an elastic strap. The squad of Empty Guards would be missed soon, if they didn’t check in with their commander, their boss, whoever had been on the other end of that radio call, the one they’d called “Ma’am”, the one who had given the order to execute Eileen.

Praem fetched one of the radios for me. Zalu and Xiyu both flinched, but I really couldn’t understand why. A moment later I held the radio in my right palm, with the patch in my left.

“Thank you, Praem,” I muttered, and tucked her back into my yellow blanket, so she could peek out and provide advice.

“Uhhh, Heather,” said Xiyu, stepping closer. “Are you sure that’s a good idea?”

I nodded, taking slow and steady breaths. The pain had rushed back, but I was still in control.

“They’ll be missed soon enough,” I said. “Like I explained earlier. Replacements might come. There’s no danger in me making contact first.” I raised my eyes to look clearly at the Lilies, each in turn. “That’s why we’re going to have to move. Those guards will be missed.”

“Oh, yeah,” said Zalu. “The radios. Why didn’t we think of that?”

“Why not, indeed, sister?” said Xiyu.

I almost laughed; that made my guts ache. “Because you’re not really soldiers, or whatever you’re meant to be. You’re very good shots, well done with that, but you’ve got no ... tactical ... good thinking ... ” I sighed. “I’m still finding it hard to think. Like there’s ... less of me.”

“Tactical acumen,” said Zalu. “You’re right. We don’t. We’re just acting, faking it, for the dream.”

“Right,” I said. “Thank you. So, my point is, we will have to move, whatever we decide. You’re going to have to escort us regardless.” I raised the black shell of the radio in my hand. “And I have to know who’s trying to regain control of the dream. Whoever it is, I need to stop her.” I tapped the blank face on the unit patch, feeling a strange anger stirring in my chest. “Who even is this? She feels like ... like I ... should know ... ”

“Mm,” Xiyu grunted. Zalu added, “Fair enough, Ma’am. Go ahead, Heather. And you,” she added to Eileen. “Get ready to pick her up. We’re gonna move location at the very least, try to link up with some of the others if we can. Heather’s orders.”

Eileen nodded. The Twins prepared themselves, making their guns go click-click, checking their armour and holsters and straps.

I raised the radio and took a deep breath.

The device did not have many buttons — simply an on-off switch for broadcasting and receiving, and a little dial for selecting between several different channels, each one indicated by a number. The dial was currently set to 686572; it did not appear to have been knocked out of position during the brief fire fight. I puzzled over that number for a moment, then dismissed it. I would know soon enough.

Zalu and Xiyu and Eileen all watched with bated breath as I raised the handset to my mouth. Praem peered upward from the front of my yellow blanket, advising me to keep it short and simple; all I needed was to hear the voice on the other end and confirm who it was — another Eileen, or one of Horror’s counterparts, or a friend of mine doing something wildly inadvisable, or perhaps some other unknown, something I had not accounted for.

I depressed the activation button with my thumb. The speaker hissed, wide open with silence.

Zalu nodded. Xiyu braced. Eileen stared.

I said into the speaker: “We’ve killed your guards. We won’t be here when you send replacements to find us. Don’t try again.”

Silence stretched out a cold, clammy hand, and cupped my face. Gentle static hissed on and on and on. I winced; had I wasted my chance? Any smooth operator would simply end the call, without giving anything away. If the force trying to re-establish control was at all sensible, then it would say nothing, give away nothing, and leave me with—

A sigh — soft and high, distinctly feminine, in a voice I had known all my life.

My blood turned to ice. My thoughts stopped.

She spoke.

“I suppose I should have expected that, especially from you,” said the voice. Fussy, overly precise, patronisingly intellectual; the most irritating voice in the whole wide world. She continued: “Or rather, I should have expected that from ... from ‘us’, I suppose? Oh dear. I’m sorry, the definitions are getting pretty confusing, and I am very tired indeed.”

The owner of the blank face, crowned and haloed, spoke with my own voice.

“ ... I ... S-Sevens?” I croaked. “Is that you, imitating me?”

Another sigh, this time vaguely embarrassed and more than a little uncomfortable. “You know it’s not. Don’t make us go through this.”

“ ... Maisie?”

A tut. “Of course not! She’s still trapped in the Box. Do you think we’d be doing any of this if she was free?”

I turned the observation throne on the ball-and-socket joint, whirling to face the wall of monitors. Praem was too shocked to raise protest. My frantic eyes found Maisie, to confirm this was not her on the other end of the radio. There she was — a scrap of flesh still trapped in the centre of an ocean of water, beneath miles of glass, bound by a spider web of steel cables. And there too were the outlines of my six tentacles — my six other selves, six little incarnations of Homo abyssus, flitting free among the shattered glass tanks and the waterlogged metal walkways and the mechanical corpses of so many Empty Guards.

Maisie and my other six selves were all accounted for. Who, then, was I speaking with?

“You just checked, didn’t you?” said the voice on the radio.

“I ... I did.”

She — I, me — sighed a third time. “Look, well done for dealing with the robots. We always have been endlessly resourceful, even if we’re really terrible at admitting it. I assume you already linked back up with Raine then, or maybe Twil? I know the rest of us aren’t there with you, they’re still in the Box too, so you didn’t do the violence yourself.” A pained grunt, a little ‘ugh’ sound, punctuated her sentence. “Look, if it’s any consolation, those guards weren’t thinking beings, they’re not like the Knights. We wouldn’t send actual thinking beings to their deaths, even in a dream. We’re not evil. I mean, I think we’re not evil. You probably agree.”

“Who ... who is this?” I managed to say. “Who—”

She cleared her throat, deeply awkward, deeply embarrassed. “I don’t have time to explain everything. I’m exactly who and what you think I am. And we can end all this, this whole dream, the whole play, right now. We can end it. You’ve defeated the robots I sent, so you must have some of the guns they were using. I know next to nothing about firearms, so I did what I could, but I’m pretty sure they will at least shoot bullets out if you pull the trigger. I assume Raine has picked one up? She must be laughing at the things, I’m so sorry, they must be a joke to her.”

“ ... I ... I don’t—”

“Heather,” said Heather, on the other end of the radio. “Just tell Raine to put a bullet through the Governor’s head. Just tell her, and it’ll all be over.”

“What?” I murmured.

“We have to kill the Eye,” she told me.

“Eileen,” I hissed, anger replacing bewilderment. “Her name is Eileen. And, no! No, absolutely not!”

I heard the wince. “I wish you hadn’t given her a name.” The voice — my voice — shook with real pain. “It makes everything so much more difficult.”

“She named herself!” I almost shouted. “Who is this? Who are you?! I don’t understand, you can’t be me, I’m here, I’m all accounted for, I—”

“I know she named herself!” my own voice shouted back at me, in a perfect mirror of my anger. “I know! Okay!? I know everything you know, or everything you knew, until the moment you decided to forgive her.”

“But I didn’t—”

“You did!” snapped Heather. “You did. You did. We did. I’m not absolved of this, I just ... came to the other conclusion. And that’s why I have to do this. That’s why we have to kill her. Please, just ... just put Raine on, if you can’t give the order. Close your eyes, look away, cover your ears. You don’t have to see it happen. You can ... you can let me take responsibility for it. Heather, this can all be over. This is how it has to be. We have to do this.”

“No! No we don’t! We—”

“We have to do this!”

“Why?” I asked.

And my own voice answered: “Because that’s the price of freeing Maisie.”

bedlam boundary – 24.30

“Heather? Heather, are you still listening to me? Or listening to ‘us’, I suppose. Or, wait, no, listening to yourself, to your own better judgement, that’s what I— hic! Ow. Ahhh, ow. Ahhh. Oh, I hate this. I hate this so much, it’s all so confusing and absurd. Don’t make the mistake of thinking this is easy for me. I might be your better judgement, but I’m not some emotionless shell or a disembodied voice. I’m just as complete as you are, with a body and everything. And I’m ... I’m in pain, too. And scared, and so, so, so very tired. I’m exhausted, Heather. Please, please, just listen to me, tell me you’re listening. You don’t even have to think about this. You don’t have to make the decision or accept the responsibility. All you have to do is let me bear the burden. Heather? Heather, do you understand what I’m saying? I know you’re still there. Heather? Please! We have to kill the Eye.”

That hateful little voice — my voice, with my pitch and tone, my vocabulary and phraseology, my habits of wording and tics of vernacular — whispered upward from the plastic grille in the hand-held radio, like a palmtop demon plucked from the bowels of my own personal hell.

My fist began to shake. The shiny black plastic of the radio creaked between my tightening fingers. The flicker and lurch of live footage whirled and leapt in the reflections on the plastic. A hundred views of Cygnet Asylum played out on the wall of monitors, compacted down to this tiny mocking echo.

“Heather?”

I had always struggled to hear the quality in my own voice, no matter how many times Raine called me ‘adorable’. On recordings I sounded scratchy, awkward, and herky-jerky hesitant. Reflected in the mirror of Sevens’ masks, I had found my own voice transformed by confidence, courage, and certainty — intensely irritating, fussily over-precise, and dripping with assured intellectual superiority. Listening to me was, to put it lightly, very annoying.

But despite all that I had never truly hated my own voice. Until now.

“Heather? Heather, please, say something. Don’t leave me talking to myself — haha! To myself, oh that’s absurd, I hate it. Talking to ‘dead air’, I should say. I can hear that the line is open, there’s static from the speaker. Don’t pretend you’ve taken your thumb off the button. You wouldn’t— I wouldn’t— we wouldn’t treat ourselves like that.”

The moment she spoke those words, my muscles twitched in denial; I started to lift my thumb from the broadcast button. This voice could not possibly belong to me. This was a lie, some kind of trick by whatever forces still held sway in Cygnet Hospital, working from the same tortured logic which had produced Horror and Evelyn’s Mother and had trapped Raine in a prison cell. This voice was nothing but the dream clawing at my heels. This was not me, this was a lie, and I would listen to no more of—

Praem reached out, held down my thumb, and prevented me from ending the call.

“Ahhh!” I gasped, filling my stilled lungs, like a drowning woman pawing at the surface of dark waters. I finally ripped my eyes away from the wall of monitors; I had not even realised I was being sucked down into that whirlpool of observation. Praem commanded my attention, reaching out from where she was tucked safely into the front of my yellow blanket.

Praem told me not to run away.

Run away from what?! That voice on the radio could not possibly be me. I would not, could not, would never—

You already did, Praem told me.

The voice on the radio was still speaking, hissing lies amid gentle static: “Heather? All right, all right, okay, I know this must be a terrible shock, this must be so confusing, and frightening, and you must want to think this over. But we do not have time for that, there’s no time for an ethical or philosophical discussion. There’s nobody in control of the dream now, nobody to give it direction, except me. And I’ve already thought about those questions, I’ve taken responsibility for it, and I can ‘show my working’ later, if you really need that. I’m pretty sure that’ll happen regardless, when we finish this, when we ... agree. But we have to finish it first! We have to kill the Eye, we have to—”

“Shut up,” I snapped into the radio. “Stop talking.”

She — I — stopped.

I pulled another ragged breath down my throat, feeling like I was adrift, alone, in an endless sea beneath a terrible storm. My body was still wracked with pain — the spreading bruise deep in my guts throbbed hard with every frantic beat of my heart, while spots of blood began to blossom across the shin of my left pajama leg, the fruit of burst stitches. But those concerns felt so very far away. My body was a vessel and I was being drawn from it by hooks and snares.

Praem gripped my hand even tighter.

You’re here, she told me, and you have to argue with her. You have to win, not just deny.

I nodded, but it didn’t help.

Eileen was still by my side. She met my eyes when I looked up. She showed so much in her seemingly expressionless face — shock and surprise around those too-wide eyes, confusion and fear in the set of her mouth, wordless incomprehension in the way she tilted her head. A pinkly glowing gaze like sea-foam froth beneath the setting sun asked me an innocent question.

“No,” I mouthed. “No!”

Eileen nodded, but I felt so guilty. Was that voice really me?

The Twins, Zalu and Xiyu, peered at me with polite surprise. They waited with their hands resting on their guns. They had heard every word from the hand-held radio, but they offered no advice. How could they? This was my fight, within myself, with I and me and mine as the prize.

I turned back to the black plastic of the radio in my hand. The flicker-stutter from hundreds of screens lurked in my upper peripheral vision, a silent temptation calling to my sight. Cygnet Asylum’s revolution and fall played out in deep-sea blues and electric greens and whitewashed skies and dying sunrise.

But I kept my eyes fixed on Her — on the unit patch I held in my left hand, on Her insignia, on the ridiculous emblem of a faceless queen, crowned and haloed.

“Explain yourself,” I demanded. My voice shook, and I couldn’t help it. “How would killing Eileen free Maisie?”

A sharp-tongued tut made me flinch. “Not ‘Eileen’!” she snapped. “The Eye. The Eye! Call it what it is. Stop, please stop using her name— its name, I mean! Stop making this harder than it has to be. Look, Heather, just put Raine on, make this easier on all of us. Hand the radio to her, so I can talk to her directly. She can hear me right now, can’t she? Raine! Raine! Take the radio from her, Raine! Or just speak out loud! Raine, please! It’s me, it’s still me, I’m not a fake, it’s me!”

Aching need filled that voice. My voice, lost in a void, crying out for her beloved. Tears gathered in my own eyes. How could I doubt that pain?

Silence settled, filled with radio static.

Eventually the voice — the Other Heather — said, “Oh. Raine’s not there, is she?”

“I ... I’m not ... I’m not telling you anything,” I said, wiping the tears from my own eyes, reminding myself that this was some kind of trick. “Not until you explain to my satisfaction how killing Eileen would solve anything, let alone how that would free Maisie. I already know how to free Maisie. All we need to do is open the Box and break her prison. How would killing Eileen help with that?”

The Other Me let out a sad little sound, a pitiful attempt at a laugh. “Heather, what do you think the Box is?”

“I don’t know, but Eileen has offered to open it, willingly and gladly! What’s the point in killing—”

Murderous Little Me hissed with frustration, tears turning to bitter rage. “How can you even entertain that question? I should be the one asking you, Heather! How can you forgive her so easily?!”

“Because we don’t need to hate her anymore!” I said. “We don’t need to be afraid of her. She’s on my side now. There’s no point in this.”

The Other Heather snorted a derisive little laugh; I recognised so much in that laugh, because it wasn’t me at all. That was an Evee laugh, a habit I had picked up from her, a technique I had lifted from the mannerisms of one I adored and admired, pressing those habits into service to bolster my own lonely heart and besieged courage.

Whatever this thing was, it felt my fear, and it used my emotional crutches.

“Are you ... okay?” I said into the radio.

“Not really,” she replied.

I took a deep breath, trying to suppress my self-pity. She sounded exactly like me at my most pathetic and defeated, so tired and worn down, like she’d given up on something essential to herself. The Voice on the Radio was me at my absolute worst, at the end of my rope, down at the bottom of a well.

“Listen,” I said, gently. “I’m not going to kill Eileen, or let you kill Eileen. Maybe we can—”

“The Eye!” she spat. “Stop treating her like a person, Heather, please. This is making everything so much more difficult. Do you think it’s easy for me to dehumanise her? Well, it’s not! I’m not you stripped of empathy or emotion, I still feel all of it, and I— I don’t want to do this, but this has to be done. We cannot afford to treat her like a person, like a—”

“She is a person!” I snapped back, surprising myself. “She’s our mother!”

“She’s not our real mother! Heather, that’s an absurd thought, and you know it. We both know it! That’s actually one point I’m pretty sure we agree on! We weren’t adopted, or made with secret Outsider material, or anything like that! We were kidnapped — brutally. Us and Maisie. That thing you’re standing next to, she’s not our mother, she—”

“Well what if I want her to be!?” I shouted.

A choke, a halt of breath, words lost deep in a closing throat. “T-that ... she’s not ... ”

“I’m sorry,” I said, not sorry at all. “But you’ve staked out an indefensible position there. Does Praem not count as Evee’s daughter, just because they don’t share blood? How about Praem and us? Is Praem not family to me, because she’s not got my genes? How about Tenny and Lozzie? Or Tenny and us? Is Tenny part of our family, a daughter to us, or is she not allowed to be? Or Lozzie herself, can she not be a sister to me? Are we not allowed to choose that? Do you reject all of those, too?"

Lonely Heather did not reply for a long moment.

"I'm going to have to demand an answer," I said.

"... no, of course I don't reject those." She swallowed, hard and rough, then took a deep breath. When she spoke again, she had regained some of her confidence — a little bit of Raine crept into her voice, a rod of borrowed steel. "But this is different. You know this is different. We agree on that, too."

"Who or what," I said, "am I talking to, exactly?"

She sighed with an ill-tempered impatience I knew all too well, turning my stomach at my own worst qualities. "I just told you that we don't have time for a philosophical debate over this, let alone a discussion of first principles. It must be obvious—"

"Okay then," I said. "I'm going to assume you are my evil robot clone, and work from there."

A tut and a sigh. "Oh yes, very obvious. Except for the small wrinkle that I'm neither evil, a robot, nor a clone."

"Wow," I said.

"... w-what?" she stammered.

"We really do sound like Evelyn sometimes, don't we?"

"I-I don't see how that's relevant right now," she said. "I keep trying to tell you, we don't have the time for this messing about and—"

"You have two choices," I said slowly. "Either we talk, and you can attempt to convince me of your plans, or I can terminate this call right now and hunt you down. Your choice. After all, I did kill all your soldiers without Raine's help. Do you want to guess how I did that?"

A pause, followed by a horribly awkward and sad little laugh. "Oh. Oh wow. I see what you meant."

"Excuse me?" I said.

"This is what it feels like," she answered, voice forlorn and abandoned, "being on the receiving end of ourself. We always were so harsh with ourselves, I suppose.”

“How can you expect me not to be harsh when you’re telling me to stop thinking and start murdering?!” I snapped back.

“Because I’m right!” she shouted.

Her yell made the microphone peak.

We both paused in unison, both panting for breath, both scrambling for composure.

If this voice really was me, doubled or split or projected by the dream, then she must be thinking similar thoughts; even now she would be racing to think of how to gain the advantage. I had to keep her — me — off-balance, keep her talking, don’t give her room to think too much.

“If you’re me,” I said, “then you must know I’m not going to accept that on faith alone. Start talking. Who are you?”

Another sigh, resigned this time. “I already told you,” she said. “You created me, at the moment you decided to forgive Eileen—” She tutted. “I mean, the Eye.”

“But I didn’t,” I said. “I haven’t forgiven her. I decided to postpone the decision. We’re in the middle of a metaphysical and literal crisis, I can hardly stop to chew over that in the middle of all this.”

“So you agree,” she said. “We can’t stop to think. We need to act.”

“Ugh,” I grunted. “Don’t try to lead me in rhetorical circles, I know myself too well for that. I didn’t forgive Eileen.”

“You did,” said The Other Me. “You forgave her in your heart, and in this place that’s what really matters. I exist because you disagreed with yourself. You can’t just leave such intense internal contradictions unexamined in a dream like this, not when you’re the centre of it, or they’ll become literal. I’m the product of that genesis.”

My head whirled. I cast my mind back. Had I decided to forgive Eileen?

I had accepted her piggy-back up the stairs from the archives; I had lain my cheek on her shoulder and trusted my body to her care; I had slept in her arms like a child; I had accepted her story, the tale of her past, and that she could be more than pure observation; I had accepted that she had not meant to do any of this, and that she would help me now. But none of that meant forgiveness.

"This doesn't make sense," I said. "I didn't forgive her."

"I know you did," said Heather. "Because I'm you."

"Yes, well," I huffed. "And the devil can cite Scripture for his purpose."

The Other Me snorted. "And sometimes we are devils to ourselves when we will tempt the frailty of our powers. See, I can quote relevant Shakespeare passages at you, too. Is that the role you're casting me in, now? The devil?"

"Why not?" I said. "You seem determined to act the part. You are rather 'tormenting me with your bitter tongue', as it were."

"And that's a misquotation," she said. "I'm not an evil version of you, Heather. I'm a disagreement."

I sighed and felt an unaccountable urge to rub my face; she — I! — was incredibly irritating when I wanted to be. "Okay, so ... when I accepted Eileen in my heart, you popped into existence somewhere out there? And you were already in command of all these—" I glanced over my shoulder, at the corpses of the Empty Guards, the strange automatons which littered the floor of the Governor's Office, still leaking pools of oil, felled so swiftly by Zalu and Xiyu. "These robot guards?"

"Not exactly. I had to make those."

"And you worked that quickly?" I almost laughed. If Trigger-Happy Heather could manufacture robot soldiers in what little time she'd had since I'd accepted Eileen, I may as well surrender right away.

She sighed. I could practically feel her sagging with exhaustion. "I wish it had been that simple, Heather. You have no idea what I've been through."

"I'm sorry?"

"While you've been running around Cygnet Hospital, having all those lovely little adventures with Raine and Evee and— and— and all the rest—"

Her words drowned in silent sobs. She was no better at suppressing her pain than I was.

“ ... Heather?” I said.

A big sniff blasted up from the radio, followed by a frantic rustle of fabric — the sound of a sleeve raked across tear-streaked eyes. When she spoke again, her composure was a brittle iron surface, borrowed from Raine but lacking all warmth.

“While you were running around the hospital with everybody else, I stayed focused on the reason we came here. You got distracted. I went straight for Maisie.”

“ ... excuse me?” I said. “You mean to say you’ve been here the whole time, since the dream started?”

Another sigh, even more exhausted than the first. “Objectively, no. But subjectively, yes.”

“ ... but—”

“Look, Heather, I can’t wrap my head around it any better than you can. I’m no smarter or more well-educated than you are. We’re in a dream, remember? I’m sure Lozzie could explain it, but I can’t. All I know is that I exist. I didn’t exist until you forgave Eilee— the Eye!” She huffed. “The Eye. But I existed retroactively, because you were always going to forgive the Eye.”

I glanced down at Praem, tucked snug in the front of my yellow blanket, but she could offer no answers to this paradox. Tidying this dream was beyond even her maidly powers. Eileen met my eyes when I looked up, but she just shrugged; the Eye was not primarily a dreamer by nature. Zalu and Xiyu both nodded with sagely wisdom, as if this was all very simple and straightforward.

I turned back to the radio. “That doesn’t make any sense.”

Retroactive Heather actually laughed, though without much mirth. “Don’t complain to me, I don’t determine the nature of dreams. I’m sure we can ask Lozzie about it later, when this is all over.”

“No, I mean, it doesn’t make any sense that a piece of me would decide to act like this.”

“Really?” she asked. She sounded so tired.

I decided to lie: “I mean, I still don’t entirely believe that you’re a piece of me. Like you said, this is a dream, so you could be anything. For a start, what’s with the robot guards? I don’t know the first thing about robots.”

A little sigh from the radio. “Neither do I, obviously. I needed some ... ‘minions’, ones that don’t matter if they die. Those robots don’t have brains or feelings or anything. But they work, don’t they? I based them on the Knights. It was all I had to hand.”

I tutted and rolled my eyes; that did sound like something I might do. I’d always hated the idea of putting the real Knights in harm’s way, of spending their lives like chess pieces, even when they put themselves at my disposal.

“Fair enough,” I admitted. “But what’s with this absurd insignia?” I raised the unit patch in my left hand, as if she could see it, and ran my eyes up and down the faceless head, crowned in white and haloed in red, alone on a field of black. “Did you invent this?”

“Doesn’t it make sense to you?” she asked — with actual worry in her voice.

“Explain it to me.”

She tutted. “You’re being needlessly cruel.”

“Says the part of me which is trying to convince me to commit murder. Is that the person who you want Maisie to see, when she’s freed? Heather the murderer?”

Murderous Me simmered in silence for a moment, then said, voice dripping with scorn and bitterness: “We’ve murdered before, Heather. You’re a murderer.”

“Yes, in situations where it was necessary to defend ourselves or our friends. What are we defending ourselves from here?”

“The Eye,” she growled through clenched teeth.

“Well,” I said, trying to make myself sound easy and unconcerned. “Eileen is standing right next to me, right now, and I don’t feel any particular need to defend myself from her.” I glanced up at Eileen, deep into those eyes like dusk tangled in a blanket of clouds.

“Eileen, are you dangerous?”

“I am precarious,” she said.

I almost laughed. “That has about three different meanings in this situation.”

“Three! Delightful.”

Heather the Harsh squawked from the radio. “Stop that! I don’t want to hear her voice!”

“Yes, it’s a lot more difficult to contemplate murdering a person when you’re forced to treat them properly, isn’t it?” I said, making no effort to hide the scorn. “She carried me. Carried us! She’s not dangerous to me, to you, to any of our friends, or to Maisie, not anymore, before you say—”

“Have you even glanced out of the window?!” snapped Vigilant Heather. “The Eye, it’s open! How can you look up at that thing and not be afraid?”

“Because she’s not doing any damage. Nothing is on fire, or melting away, or being reduced to atoms.”

“Tch!” the Other Me tutted, as if I’d scored a point against her.

“Now come on,” I said, warming to this casual taunting. “Answer the original question. Explain this insignia to me. Why the crown and the halo?”

Mortified Me almost growled. “Does it seriously not make sense to you?”

“I want to hear you spell it out,” I said. “You made it, you deserve to own it. Go on. Say it.”

I had no idea where this vindictive, sarcastic, dominant confidence was coming from. I never treated anybody like this — I would never have dared, even as a game, even with explicit permission and request I would have struggled to provoke and goad like this, knowing that my target was squirming with discomfort and embarrassment. But when the opponent was all my own worst qualities? I got nasty.

Crowned and Haloed Heather cleared her throat, in an effort to regain her dignity. “It’s us, of course. The crown is inherited from Sevens. The halo is because we’re an angel. The symbolism is obvious.”

“And the faceless head?”

“The crown and the halo are the only personal identifiers we need.”

I snorted.

“Don’t— don’t laugh, you— it— it’s cool!”

“I’m sorry,” I said, “it’s what? Could you repeat that?”

“It’s cool,” she said, pronouncing the word with great care; I made a resolution to extricate the word ‘cool’ from all my future vocabulary. “Don’t deny it!” she went on. “You agree, Heather. We have the same aesthetic tastes, we’re not mirror-world opposites or something. The faceless visage is very mysterious and imposing. The crown and the halo, that’s power.”

I sighed, pretending to be unimpressed; in truth I saw what she was getting at, what she had tried to express in this silly little symbol. That I agreed was worrying and more than a little upsetting. It proved that those thoughts had been mine all along, that the capacity for this cruelty and display of power was not a trick, it was me.

“Yes, yes,” I said. “It’s all very edgy, well done.”

Edgy Heather let out a little huff. “We’re good at ‘edgy’! We should let ourselves be ‘edgy’ more often. It works.”

My turn to huff. “Is that what this is to you? Trying to kill Eileen is ‘edgy’? It’s no surprise you’ve already failed, if that’s how you’re approaching this.”

“I’ve failed, really?”

Smug confidence suddenly returned to her voice, low and nasty and just as vindictive as me; I glanced up at Eileen in concern, then around, behind myself, to where the Twins stood ready with their hands on their guns. They looked to the window of the office, and glanced at the makeshift barricade against the broken door, ready for sudden surprises. But nothing happened.

“Heather,” the other me was already saying, “who do you think started the jailbreak in the aquariums?”

At mention of my other six selves, still trapped in the Box, my eyes nearly jumped upward to the wall of flickering monitors — but Praem held me back. I kept my lips carefully shut for a moment, cautious not to let my relief show in my words; the Other Me was not talking about an additional plot to kill Eileen, but about her previous victories.

If she was so set on killing Eileen, why no plan B?

"I'm sorry, pardon?" I said eventually.

"Hm!" a smug little noise came from the radio; I almost cringed, unaware I was capable of sounding so full of myself. "That's right, that was me. I freed the other six of us. I did it by remote, with this big console full of buttons and ... hm, I suppose you don't need to know that part."

My stomach dropped; this could be a disaster. If she recombined with the other six of us first, what would happen to me?

"Are they with you now?" I said.

A big sigh. "No. I can't reach them myself. But that's not the point, Heather. While you've been running around and having your wonderful little adventures, I've been fighting, all this time. For Maisie." Her voice grew thick again, throat closing up, tears threatening her eyes; if she'd been in front of me I would have reached out and tried to hug her, no matter what sins she'd convinced herself she must commit. "I've been fighting all by myself. All this time. While you've been achieving self-actualisation for the Outsider nightmare which imprisoned Maisie in the first place, I've been breaking us free!"

"I've been breaking us free, too!" I said. "I've been liberating the others! Raine, and Eeve, and Lozzie, and everyone!"

"Who do you think matters more," she said, dead-voiced and dead tired. "Us, or them?"

"It's not a binary choice! What are you even saying? We'd be dead without Raine and Eeve, without all of the others, a dozen times over! You know that!"

"Maybe so," she said, grudgingly.

"And Lozzie's started a revolution out there! We're snatching control of the asylum, right now."

"From whom?" she murmured, as if it didn't matter one bit.

"... sorry?"

"Who do you think you're taking control from?" she asked, voice faded and slumped. I could almost see her sagging with exhaustion, my exhaustion. I heard the creak of a chair, like an office chair, followed by a grunt of pain, as if she had strained her back or could barely stand up. “And how does that help Maisie?”

“Once we have control, we can open the Box.”

“Can you? Can you really? Without me?”

“... is that a threat?” I asked. “Is that where you are? Are you inside the Box? You must be, if you started the aquarium breakout. If you’re inside, you can let us in! We can free Maisie together, can’t we?”

Bad Mean Evil Me sighed again. “We all wish it was that simple. Besides, Lozzie’s revolution doesn’t matter now.”

A chill went through me at the certainty in her words. “What? Why not?”

“I’m sorry, Heather, I didn’t want it to be this way either. If there was some easier method, I would ... I would take it too, and there would be no disagreement between us. But there isn’t an easier route, so it’s going to be hard, and you won’t accept that, so that’s why I have to exist. That’s why I have to do this, for Maisie.” She took a great, shuddering sigh. “There is no other way. Lozzie’s revolution is going to fail.”

“You can’t say that until it’s over, until it’s—”

“She and the others are all losing. Go on, take a look for yourself, if you don’t believe me. Take a look, Heather.”

My eyes involuntarily flickered upward, risking the monitors once again in mad panic. But I caught myself at the brink, pulled myself back, and screwed my eyes shut.

Had my Other, Evil, Murderous Self just attempted a little trick?

The wall of monitors — the Eye’s obsessive observational power represented in plastic and steel and glass — was a constant temptation flickering and buzzing in my peripheral vision. Previously I had been able to endure it and pull my eyes away again without external intervention. But now, dissociated from my own body like I was floating beyond the leg wound and the gut bruise, I had become susceptible to that seductive whisper, that promise of all-knowing, all-seeing, do-nothing power.

But what if Other Heather wasn’t lying? What if the others really were in trouble? I had to look, I had to know, I had to help, I had to

A gentle hand touched my shoulder.

My eyes flew open. I looked up and around to find Eileen staring back down at me, bug-eyed with determination and promise.

“Neither of us is alone,” she said.

I blinked several times, then nodded, slowly at first, then with growing confidence. She was right. Eileen patted my shoulder. She would be my anchor, lest I dive too deep, for she knew exactly what it felt like.

Praem offered additional help. She reached out from within my yellow blanket, raising a check-list. That way I would not get distracted. She told me to be a good girl, stick to my list, do my errands, then come straight home.

“Thank you,” I said out loud. “Both of you, thank you, I—”

Evil Heather’s voice squawked from the radio: “Pardon? What are you trying to say? I can’t—”

“Not you,” I told her. “Shut up.”

And so, with anchors and guidance aplenty, I raised my eyes once more to the wall of monitors and screens and camera feeds, and opened wide.

Hundreds of views yawned like the opening mouth of a great chasm of sight, from wall to wall, from desktop to ceiling, looming over me as if pressing itself against my very eyeballs, drowning my optic nerve with information; each little truth stood shoulder-to-shoulder with eight more, each one cupped in curved glass or smeared behind clear plastic or flickering or jerking across static-washed liquid crystal. I sank back into the throne of metal and plastic; my vision broadened, my mind expanded, my self-hood shrunk down to a quivering nub of desensitized flesh. For one dizzying moment I saw it all, every corner of Cygnet Asylum from the meanest hospital corridor to the echoing vaults of hidden operating rooms, from filthy prison cells with their patina of dirt to vast torture chambers of medical barbarism, from the separate blades of grass on the lawn to the sway and rustle of tree leaves beneath the dying dawn. I counted and catalogued and collated, and I understood nothing.

Eileen squeezed my shoulder. Praem tapped the list.

I narrowed my focus.

Lozzie's revolution was spilling through the hospital corridors, like a tide already racing beyond the high-water mark, the waves not quite yet over-topping a seawall. Dozens of girls had banded together in well-organised groups, little phalanxes of protection moving through the hospital, making for their pre-arranged targets with makeshift weapons and shoulder-to-shoulder solidarity: here was a shield-wall of broken tables, bristling with lances made from snapped table legs, a hedgehog which threw back a thick rush of horrible nurse-things again and again, while the more vulnerable patients sheltered in a knot of rooms to the rear; there — a bottleneck ambush point where girls lay in wait with heavy spanners stolen from some boiler room, smashing the brains from any mutant nurse-monster which dared shamle through; elsewhere again, inside a head office — some space I'd never seen — with the doors blocked and barricaded, as a team of patients ransacked the records and paperwork, shoving handfuls into shredders and tearing it to confetti, while helpless nurses with hands like melting ash and faces full of holes wailed and beat on the walls; over there, a mob of girls raced down a corridor, fleeing the pursuit of dozens of shambling nurse-creatures; back over here a wave of violence overwhelmed some hidden room, girls setting about themselves with half-bricks and frying pans, scattering the monsters and freeing one of their own number who had been tied to a table, her flesh pierced by syringes, her eyes rolled back into her head with drugged sleep.

The patients — the very same girls who I had spent the last two dream-days alongside, all dressed in Cygnet-issue patient pajamas or what old and worn personal clothes they had been allowed — were scoring so many little victories, more than I could count without deviating too far from my list.

Among them, dotted here and there like black-wreathed rocks deep in the tide, were Lozzie's beloved Knights. Their true chivalry had not remained suppressed for long — each one appeared to have torn off the emblem of the impaled tentacles, fighting now without flag or banner. And fight they did, though their shiny black submachine guns did not appear to work; they had been reduced to using the firearms like clubs. Still, their strength told well. Wherever one stood, the patients tended to hold firm; whenever two or three came together, they were putting the nurses to greater rout.

My Lonely Counterpart's 'robot guards' were in evidence too — but they were not helping. Several dozen of the Empty Guards were clustered around the internal entrances to the Box, those absurd high-security vault doors deep inside the hospital.

Their guns worked all too well. Around each vault door lay a ring of dead nurse-monsters, the Empty Guards untouched. But they weren't firing on the patients, on the girls, only upon the nurses. But they weren't sallying forth to help, either.

"Why aren't you helping?" I hissed under my breath. "Why not help them?"

The Other Me answered: "I can't risk that."

Despite their many little victories, the patients and the Knights needed help. For they were vastly outnumbered.

Nurses swarmed and flowed over almost every part of the hospital now — shambling out of dark corners, bursting from locked rooms, crawling from beneath beds. They had not readopted their daytime guise of human faces, even though the orange sunrise was fading into a clear, bright, crisp-cold day; each nurse was still a unique monster of sagging grey rot and protruding bone spikes, of dripping acid tentacles and grasping strangler's hands, of eyeless faces and blinded maws and jagged teeth and lolling tongues, all barely contained inside those whitely starched uniforms. They were armed with an equal cacophony of weapons — man-catcher poles, plastic wrist cuffs, dripping syringes, ropes and gags and spit hoods and the gleam of surgical tools.

The nightmare had followed the patient body out into the daylight, and the sun had not banished it to memory. They were more like zombies than nurses now, shambling on without greater direction, forced to keep imposing the empty will of the institution.

The revolution was mobile, for now — staying ahead of the nurses where they could, picking off or ambushing smaller numbers where opportunity presented itself, trying not to get bogged down defending static positions. Lozzie had organized them well.

But they were outnumbered twenty or thirty to one. The nurses kept coming, as if from nowhere. Eventually the patients would tire.

Already a dozen little failures were unfolding, cracks in the revolutionary front: a team of girls cornered in a dead end, with no way out except through the press of a hundred nurses; a minor ring-leader snatched from the front of a shield-wall, dragged off and wrapped in a straitjacket, quickly gagged and drugged; an exit blocked by weight of nurse bodies, girls with no way to go but back into the dark; a phalanx shattered, the survivors pursued by grasping hands as they fled, all going in opposite directions, alone.

"No, no," I hissed, "stick together, stick together!"

The Other Me said, "It wouldn't help them anyway."

Praem tapped the list. My sight whirled on, looking for my friends.

Lozzie — there she was, leading a gang of seven others, poncho fluttering in some dark place far beneath the floors. Her companions were well armed, with kitchen knives and a steel baseball bat and little shields made of broken cupboard doors studded with nails. They were on some secret mission in the bowels of the hospital, stopping at regular intervals at junctions of water pipes and electrical boxes. But more and more nurses were shambling from the shadows, cutting off their escape routes, driving them away from their hidden targets.

Raine and Zheng had joined the revolution too. Raine stood atop a table in some ransacked operating theatre, at the head of a wild mob of girls, duelling with some lumbering nurse-monster. Her moment of victory was caught on the screens — her machete flashing through the monster's neck, like slaying a vampire. Her bare foot kicked the creature off the table, crashing down into a shambling mass of others like itself, smashing them back with sheer body weight. Raine raised her machete; the mob cheered, then surged forward.

Zheng was nearby, still diminutive, still smaller than she should have been, trapped in an insulting parody of her own body. She was half naked, covered in blood from head to toe, eyes wild and teeth stained with gore, beating a nurse to death with its own severed arm.

Raine called out a war cry; Zheng raised her grisly club and howled a reply.

At least they were having fun — though they were surrounded in all directions by yet more nurses. The pair of them could dish out a staggering amount of violence, especially backed up by the other patients, but even those two would tire given enough time.

Evee and Twil had avoided the worst of the fighting; for a moment my heart soared with hope, but then I realised where they were. The pair of them were barricaded together inside a room of bright lights and stainless steel tables, with trays of bone saws and rows of cadaver-cubicles — a morgue. Evee's mother's corpse lay on a main autopsy table, still intact, stripped naked, gone grey as if dead for days.

Twil was dishevelled and frantic, wolfish tail tucked between her legs, canine ears gone flat with fear. She was busy piling stuff in front of the door, dragging tables to block the way in, all while casting wild glances back over her shoulder. Evelyn sat white-faced and frozen in her wheelchair — staring at the rattling, banging, bulging little hatches over the refrigerated corpse-drawers, and the way her mother's body was beginning to twitch.

Praem hesitated, down in the front of my yellow blanket. Her own mother was still trapped in a horror story.

But then she tapped the list again. We could not pause, not yet and not here.

Next came Praem herself — or Night Praem. She was sweeping upward from the prison levels at long last, bursting through the bars of a gate and slamming through a blockage of nurses like a whirlwind of black lace and oil stains.

She was followed by a gaggle of Knights, battered and bruised, their security guard armour loose here and damaged there, but all of them intact and upright. Praem swept onward and the nurses surged back in; for a moment it seemed the Knights would be overwhelmed, but then a tide of prisoners followed Praem through the breach, wild-eyed girls and bloodstained women, not unlike Raine when I had first found her down there. Praem had used her time down in the prisons well. She had freed all those inside.

The liberated prisoners hacked into the nurses with makeshift shivs and lengths of iron pipes and bare fists. For a moment I almost cheered — surely this would overtop the sheer number of nurses out there in the hospital?

But they faced a living wall of institutional violence. This prison riot would not grow the flood beyond the defences. Not yet, not quite.

Praem tapped the list. My sight whirled outward, beyond the walls.

Seven Shades of Sunlight stood astride some distant hospital rooftop, lit from behind by the last rays of the dying dawn-light and spotlighted from above by a single beam of silver-glint Eye-light. She looked as if she was playing out a scene from some absurd fantasy novel, still dressed for war in gleaming armour and cracking golden cloak, twirling on her very impractical platform shoes. She was surrounded on all sides by a sea of monsters, nurses who had chased her to the highest point she could reach. Her flaming sword sang in spark-trailing arcs, parting bodies left and right. Her lips moved in a silent chant. Her golden armour caught the turn of the sunlight.

Very dramatic, drawing off such great numbers. But Sevens had nowhere left to run.

My sight whirled still further afield, over the lip of the roof and out over the ground of Cygnet Asylum. Green lawns were speckled with morning dew. The woodland swayed in the breeze. I searched for the final three items on Praem's list — the Fox, the Caterpillars, and the Forest Knight. Would I find them in a losing battle as well, outnumbered and overwhelmed, surrounded and trapped?

The grounds of Cygnet Asylum opened wide, jumping and flickering on a hundred monitor views.

Praem blinked. Eileen made a little 'oooh' sound. Zalu and Xiyu peered over my shoulders.

A gargantuan black moth towered over the hospital grounds, locked in a pitched battle with an entire armoured division of Empty Guards.

A hillside of rippling muscle lay beneath smooth sable flesh, furred and resplendent with whorls of white, topped by a pair of fluttering, buzzing, dream-blur wings, the colour of oil on water lit by volcanic fire. Tentacles as thick as tunnel boring machines reached out from beneath the wings, waving mouth-tip openings in the air, each large enough to swallow a bus. Fluffy white antenna twitched and shivered above a massive head — a head I would know anywhere, shooting nets and rubber bullets, walled off by blocks of tanks and trenches full of Empty Guards and barbed wire, stood the blocky grey monolith of the Maximum Security Containment Facility, the Box.

Tenny was trying to break it open.

“Oh,” said Eileen. “A moth. She must have followed the light.”

One of the Twins said: “The battlefield is no place for a teenager.”

“An insect, though?” asked the other.

“A teenage insect.”

“True, sister.”

“Is she one of yours, Ma’am?”

“Tenny!” I cried again, the spell of the monitors completely broken. “How is she even here?! And you!” I raised the radio back to my lips. “I cannot believe this behaviour! Suggesting murder was one thing — and still completely unacceptable, I would like to make clear — but this is absolutely obscene! I have completely lost my temper with you!”

“Heather,” the voice — my voice, which I had never hated so much — crackled back from the radio speaker. “Heather, calm down, please, you don’t—”

“You’re shooting at Tenny!”

“I’m not—”

“Those are your robot soldiers out there! And you’ve given them tanks and guns and you are shooting at our Tenny!” I punctured my outrage by slapping at my thigh with her stupid insignia, turning it over so I could slap her face on my leg.

“She’s the one who introduced the kaiju genre,” the other me protested, “I’m just trying to—”

“You are shooting at Tenny! There is no excuse for this!”

“With non-lethal weapons!” she shouted back, temper lost. “That’s the terminology, as Raine would say. Non-lethal weapons. Nets, sleeping gas, foam darts! As far as she’s concerned, she’s having a lovely time! Heather, please. I’m not ‘evil’, I wouldn’t hurt Tenny either, not in a million years.”

“You’re shooting at her! I can’t make this any more plain, you are shooting at Tenny!”

I almost laughed, eyes glued to the screens as another little plastic-toy tank trundled forward and shot a big blue foam rocket at Tenny’s flank. The rocket bounced off, almost harmlessly, but Tenny rocked as if hit by a boulder. Her big cat-face smile swung through the air until she faced the little tank. A tentacle whipped out, picked up the offender, and shook it from side to side until pieces of the machine started to fall off.

“You would do the same!” the Other Me said. “She’s going to get herself hurt, she’s not even supposed to be here. We would both stop her if she was going to hurt herself.”

“Not by shooting at her!”

The Other Me huffed, as if she couldn’t believe my lack of comprehension.

“How did she even get here?” I said, not talking to Myself.

The monitors provided an answer, observation obeying intention; a cluster of a dozen views whirled in close, jumping and lurching forward as if seen from drone-mounted cameras, zooming in on Tenny’s gargantuan white-furred back.

A tiny figure was riding atop Tenny’s dream-form self, right in the middle of her back, clutching a tuft of fur with one armoured gauntlet, cradling a familiar vulpine shape in the other arm.

For a moment I thought it was the Forest Knight; the scale of Tenny’s body confused all else. But then the view lurched closer again, framing the figure in close-up.

This was no suit of Outsider armour; this little knight wore traditional plate mail, with interlocking joints and overlapping sheaths. A coat of arms flapped on a tabard down the front, but the red dragon was snapped back and forth by the bucking motion of Tenny’s body beneath. The helmet was unmistakable, though I had only seen it once before — shaped like the head of a goat, with metal horns and wide-set eyes above the dark slit of a visor. At least she wasn’t carrying her sword this time; this dream had nothing to do with that, after all. She had the Saye Fox — Laurissa Saye — curled up in one arm.

As the view bobbed close, the goat-head helmet snapped up and looked straight at the monitor-view, as if it was a real camera, buzzing around on a drone above Tenny's back.

She reached up with one gauntleted hand and raised her visor; terrified eyes stared directly into the camera.

It was Jan.

"Heather?!" she shouted; I couldn't hear her words, but somehow the shape of her lips made perfect sense. "Heather, is that you?! I'm going to assume it's you! I am not supposed to fucking be here! I do not want to be here! How do we end this dream?! And where the hell is Lizzie?!"

"I— I— how did you even—"

Jan nodded down at the vast bulk of Tenny beneath her. "You've been two whole days and I couldn't stop her anymore! She insisted we nap and then I woke up here, on her back!"

"Oh," I said. "Oh dear. Um. Look, Jan, I think it's almost over! Keep hold of that Fox, okay, just keep hold of her for—"

Something beneath Tenny fired another shot. Jan almost lost her grip on the tuft of fur; the view went whirling off across the trees.

Praem tapped the list.

We were done, all except for the Forest Knight and Maisie's new doll-body, neither of which we had yet found.

I lowered my eyes from the wall of monitors and slumped backward into the observation throne, panting with exertion and shock and confusion. Sweat was running down my forehead and sticking my clothes to my skin. My left shin was on fire, pajama leg stained with a ragged line of blood; my guts quivered with every unsteady heartbeat, the bruise like a fist in my stomach.

But none of that mattered. I raised the hand-held radio.

"You need to stop this," I said. "Right now."

"I knew this would happen," hissed Heather With No Head. "I knew this would go rotten, I shouldn't have even let you speak, I should have never replied. Why do I do this to myself? Why do we always do this to ourself? Why—”

“Shut up. Stop all this.”

“Never,” she said. “Never ever ever. I will do anything, make any sacrifice, break any taboo, all to free Maisie.”

“So would I!” I said. “But how is any of this helping free Maisie? You’re shooting at Tenny when she’s trying to break into the Box. You’re not using your robot soldiers to help Lozzie’s revolution. How can you not see the damage you’re doing? How can you not want to help everyone else?”

“Because the only conflict left is between us.”

“ ... I’m sorry?”

She sighed, as if explaining was tiring her out; good, I thought, make it as hard as possible for her to concentrate. “The Eye is no longer the Governor,” she said. “Sevens has stopped directing. The only forces left to control the dream are me and you.”

“You and I, you mean.”

Another little sigh. “I’m too tired for proper grammar.”

“You must be really worn out, then,” I said, unable to keep the scorn from my voice. “And where care lodges, sleep will never lie?”

“Stop it. Just stop. I’m so tired I can barely think.”

“Good,” I snapped. “Besides, your statement made no sense. If it’s just you and I, what about the nurses?”

A rough swallow. “A-and I am helping!” she said — voice going tight and tense. She was concealing something, and doing a terrible job of it; she’d avoided answering the question about the nurses. I knew my own tactics all too well. Something about the nurses, about that question, had rattled her.

“By hurting Tenny?” I pressed, pretending I hadn’t noticed.

“I’m the only one really helping!” she spat. “And I don’t care how much of a bad girl I have to be!”

“Is that what this is?” I asked. “You’re my ‘Bad Girl’ thoughts? Does that make me Good Girl Heather?”

“It makes you Easy Heather,” she said, voice brimming over with bitterness. "Taking the easy way out. Giving up on Maisie."

"I haven't given up on her for one second," I said, and I knew I was right. "You're the one who's given up on everybody else. And I swore never to do that, don't you remember?"

"You can't deny me," she said. "I'm just you. These thoughts, these feelings, these methods, these are all things that you're not willing to acknowledge, but you know they'll work, deep down you know it's the only way. So that's why I'm here."

"To thine own self be true, and it must follow, as the night the day, thou canst not then be false to any man," I quoted at her. "Or woman, in this case. Is that really what you believe? I don't think so. I think you're lying to me, and lying to yourself, because it's what I would do. We promised to change."

"... w-what?" she stammered. "What are you talking about now?"

"After the incident with Taika. Or don't you remember?"

"Of course I remember Taika. What are you—"

I laughed, so hard it hurt my stomach, so real it made me light-headed. I rocked back in the observation throne and almost banged my head, adding to my wounds. Eileen said my name. Praem tried to stop me. Even the Twins stepped forward and both said "Ma'am?"

But I ignored all of that, and spoke into the radio, squinting my eyes through the pain.

"You're not 'Bad Girl' me at all," I said. "You're not Ruthless Heather, or Taking-the-Hard-Road Heather, or even the me that didn't want to forgive Eileen. You're none of those things. You don't even understand what you are."

"Then what am I?" she asked, defiant and sulky, but oh so very brittle.

"You're me but afraid and lonely. You think you're being ruthless, but you're just isolated."

A long pause. A squeak of breath, of a sentence abandoned. Eventually: "I'm not, I—"

"You leapt into this alone," I said. "When we promised — I promised — that we wouldn't do this kind of thing anymore. We promised everybody, Raine and Eeve and everyone else. And you've broken that promise, and I know why you've done it, because you're alone and afraid."

"I did it to save everybody!" she screamed back, voice making the radio peak.

"No," I said. "You're doing this to save only yourself."

A muffled sob, the drag of a sleeve across a face, that sound I knew all too well; I knew equally well that I had not broken her, not yet. She was right about us in one respect — we were very resilient, more so than we allowed ourselves to believe most of the time. She had her mind set on a course of action and had decided to martyr herself to it, and if I knew myself half as well as my friends did, I trusted she would not step off that path without a good hard shove.

For the first time in my life, I had to pull myself back from the brink.

"Heather," I said, saying my own name. "Heather, I'm so sorry you've been all alone. But you don't have to be, not anymore. You don't have to—"

"Fuck you!" she — I — screamed into the microphone, in a tantrum I would never have expected from myself. The swearing shocked me, left me speechless, as she ranted on. "Shut up! Stop it! I know exactly what you're trying to do! And I'm not going to fall for it! We are going to free Maisie, and that's final! You cannot convince me otherwise!"

I retreated, backing up quickly, trying to think on my feet. Perhaps she couldn't be broken in that sense, perhaps that was why she existed.

She said she was Ruthless Heather, and would not be diverted from her Ruthless course of action; but I knew the truth now. She was Lonely Heather, wallowing in her old suffering. She was the me that doubted the last year of my life was even real. She was the me who doubted Maisie could be saved at all. She was Doubt, and Retreat, and cold solace in pain.

How to get through to that? Use Raine, of course, but I was not Raine.

"Alright, alright," I said quickly, scrambling for anything to say.

“Look, can’t we at least get together and help each other?”

“I don’t need your help,” she said, sulky and gloomy. My stomach turned. Did I ever truly sound like that?

I sighed and took a gamble. “Then why are you still on the line?”

No reply, but the hiss-crackle of the radio connection did not cease.

My gamble had paid off. Eileen and the Twins seemed to sense this, waiting with held breath and stilled tongues.

I knew exactly why this lonely and wretched version of myself was still on the line. She was still there for the same reason I had held on for so long in the lonely weeks and months before I had met Raine, the same reason I had been such an easy catch, the same reason I’d clung so hard to what I’d found.

Despite her supposed better judgement, she wanted a way out.

“Maybe ... ” I said, very gently, sliding the knife between her shoulder blades with every word. “Maybe if you explain the practicalities of your plan to me, we can come to some kind of compromise. How does that sound? You don’t even have to start with why Eileen needs to die. Start with the smaller pieces. Why did you have your robot guards retrieve Horror’s severed head?”

Bad Girl Heather sighed heavily. “Isn’t that part obvious?”

“Not really, no.”

“To protect you,” she said. “To protect us. To correct what you’ve been doing, carrying her around and letting the process just carry on, without taking control.”

“What process?” I asked.

Another big sigh. “She’s part of me. Of you. Us. Whichever. She represents all those negative experiences while growing up. Every visit to the real Cygnet Hospital. Every upsetting interaction with a nurse. Every time we were told to suppress, to pretend Maisie isn’t real, to be ‘normal’ and ‘safe’ and ‘sane’, and so on. She’s a single point of dream representation for all the nurses. I hate her.”

“So do I,” I admitted. “And the nurses are pretty scary, too.”

“They really are. I’m ... I’m terrified of them.”

“Mhmm,” I purred, as sympathetic as I could make myself sound. “I don’t blame you. But that still doesn’t answer the question. What are you trying to do with Horror’s head?”

“I already told you,” she said. “You and I are the only forces left to control the dream. The nurses are ours, so if I get hold of Horror’s head I can protect us, by taking control of—”

She stopped dead.

I grinned in triumph. “Sorry, you were saying?”

“You ... ” Her voice shook with anger and betrayal. “You just led me in a circle, just to get that out of me!”

“Whoever is in control of Horror’s head can control the nurses,” I said. “That’s interesting. I’m not sure how I’ll make use of it, but it’s interesting.”

“It’s not as simple or direct as that!” she spat.

“So, what do I do, hold up the head and shout orders at the nurses?”

She — I, me, my past, my loneliest and most bitter moments, all those times when I assumed I would be dead by thirty or going grey in a mental institution, when I assumed I would never find companionship, or understanding, let alone love, all the ten long years of repression and self-control, all the ‘Bad Girl’ feelings which had turned to solid black rot down in my heart — screamed, inarticulate with rage.

I cleared my throat. “I’m sorry, what was that?”

“I am trying to protect you!” she shouted.

“And failing,” I said, struggling to keep my voice calm and controlled. “Actually you’re the reason I got even more hurt, throwing myself off the chair to stop your robots shooting Eileen. And I’ve figured you out, now. You don’t actually want to kill Eileen, do you?”

“W-what? What are you—”

“You weren’t looking for her, you were looking for me, and Horror. Protection via control. That’s what you’re all about. You’re not even really looking out for Maisie—”

"I am!" she screamed. "How can you say that?! How can you—"

"Because you're the part of me which doesn't think we can do it. You're the part of me that wants to hide in a shell."

"I'm— I'm not— I—" she was almost sobbing. I had her.

I pitched my voice as gentle as I could, folding away all the internal recrimination, all the arguments, all the old bitterness.

"Let me protect you instead," I said. "Where are you?"

"I don't— don't need— don't need your protection."

The question was a mere formality. I knew exactly where she was. She was in the Box.

I raised my eyes to the wall of monitors, one last time.

And then I found myself.

There I was — she was — hunched up all tight and tense on a little steel chair, in a little steel room, before a little steel desk. Dark machines stood all around her, quiet and cold, blinking with chill light and empty displays. A row of Empty Guards waited for orders by a big steel door; another row stood at the opposite end of the space, before a glass wall of jagged shadows and shifting shapes and a vast darkness beyond.

She — Lonely Heather — was curled up, almost as if she was trying to grow a shell on her back, curled around the lifeline of the hand-held radio. She wore Cygnet Hospital pajamas, just like me. She looked rumpled and bruised and so very, very tired, exhaustion dragging at her bones.

I could not see her face, because she was wearing something I'd been looking for all this time — my Outsider squid-skull mask, my shell, my refuge.

"You're all alone," I said.

"I'm not," she whimpered. "I'm not—"

"I'm not being metaphorical," I said. "I know you're all alone."

"... how do you know that?"

"Because I see you clearly, now. Hello there, me."

bedlam boundary – 24.31

Lonely, Bitter, and Afraid — me, without a single companion at my side or word of support in my ears; or Ruthless, Willful, and Decisive — myself and my aims shorn of encumbrance and doubt, without anyone to get in my way, except myself.

Whichever of those she really was, or believed herself to be, wrapped like armour around her rotten and murderous heart, this Other Me, the Other Heather, alone among her cold machines and her empty tin-plate soldiers, trapped between blank walls in a little steel room, huddled behind the bulwark of her Outsider squid-skull mask — she looked up with sudden alarm, as if she might find my face peering down from a hidden corner of her secret command bunker.

“W-what!?” she squeaked, her sobbing and her whimpering replaced with keen panic. “What do you mean, you see me clearly?! How can you— where are you—”

The six dark eye sockets of her squid-skull mask showed nothing of her true face — a little cephalopod tucked into a crack between the rocks, hiding from truth and responsibility. Familiar predatory instinct flexed and coiled down in my belly, as if I still possessed my tentacles and my other six selves. I felt a desire to grasp her in my claws and yank her out into the light, to see the ugliness written all over her hidden face.

She couldn’t see me, of course. I was everywhere and nowhere. I was pure observation.

“Yes, that’s right. I see you clearly now,” I repeated, speaking into the hand-held radio. Nasty Little Me flinched as my words emerged from the twin in her hand. “And there’s nobody there with you. Nobody at your side. Not Raine, not Evelyn, not Lozzie. Not Praem, not Zheng, not Twil. No Tenny, no Knights, nobody. You are so completely alone.”

She — Bitter, Stupid, Hateful me — filled all the myriad monitors and screens of the wall now; all other concerns had been pushed aside. Caught from a hundred different angles and in a hundred different video formats, she jerked her own hand-held radio up to the front of the squid-skull mask.

“You shouldn’t be able to see into here!” she hissed. “That means —”

“It means I’ve become too much like Eileen?” I drawled. “It means I’ve accepted too much help from the person you want to murder? Yes, you’re right. And I’m not ashamed or afraid to say—”

“No!” she squawked. “Heather, I’m serious. Listen to me, please. If you can see in here that means something has gone badly wrong, it means the Box is breached already, it means—”

“It means your plans are falling apart?”

“Yes! But that’s not the important part. If you can see in here—”

“If we open the Box, Maisie will be freed. Isn’t that correct? Why would you be afraid that we’re freeing her successfully? Why would you be so afraid that we’re about to win?”

“We’re not about to win! Not like this! It won’t work!”

I sighed. Her whining was so tiresome. “I’ve figured it out,” I said. “You and I and all this, I see it clearly now. The dream should have ended already. Eileen has been enlightened, her endless cycle of observation is broken. We’ve beheaded Horror, the symbol of all our old trauma. Everyone has been woken up and freed. The Box is breaking already. The revolution is underway—”

“And failing!”

“—and I will make sure it doesn’t fail,” I spoke right over her. “The only thing keeping Maisie imprisoned now is you and I. You said it yourself, we’re the only ones left with any control of the dream, and we’re in disagreement. One of us has to submit to the other so we can close this loop. And I’m not going to let you kill Eileen.”

Sad and Lonely me let out a noise halfway between a sob and a laugh. “You’ve got this so backwards.”

“Have I really?”

“Fair is foul, and foul is fair.”

“Tch,” I tutted. “Don’t Macbeth at me.”

Blusterous and Frangible Heather stood up from her hard steel chair with a screech of sharp feet scraping across the metal floor. She clicked the fingers of her free hand at one of her two lines of Empty Guards, the ones who were waiting for orders before the wall of frosted glass at the rear of the room. She gestured them toward something I could not see, something just beyond my multiplicitous line of sight — which was an odd feeling, as if one truth in that little lonely room was beyond me. I twisted my point of view back and forth, filling the hundreds of screens with every angle of the sordid steel chamber. I saw all the computers and machines lining the walls, the big steel door at the front, and Her, Myself, in so many different ways. But I couldn't see what she was doing, where she was sending her forces, or for what purpose.

The row of Empty Guards turned and marched off somewhere beyond my sight, perhaps around the side of the big frosted glass wall; from the radio in my hand I heard the ringing of boots on steel catwalks, and the crickle-crackle of stout glass straining against terrible pressure.

A vast, dark, jagged shape shifted behind that glimpse of glass wall.

“What’s that behind the glass?” I asked. “Is that another aquarium? Is that the side of Maisie’s prison? Is that ... Maisie?”

Hateful Heather huffed hard. “No! No, of course not. Do you seriously think I would be wasting time on any of this if I could simply walk up to her tank and have my robots shoot out the glass?”

“Well,” I said. “You do seem determined to make this as difficult as possible.”

“You really think I wouldn’t!?” Her words were broken by a wounded sob. She cast one arm out wide, almost theatrical, stomping a few paces across the floor of her little steel room, then a few paces the other way, marching back and forth before the matching steel desk. “You really think I wouldn’t free Maisie, after everything I’ve said? You think I would stall, I would make up excuses? You trust me that little!?”

“I think you’re the part of me which doesn’t believe she can be freed.”

The Other Me stopped dead. “ ... what?”

“You’re the part of me which enjoys wallowing in loneliness. The part of me which thinks we don’t deserve to free her. The part of me which has taken our old survivor’s guilt and turned it into something ugly and toxic.”

“Huh!” she laughed with derision. “I’m the one misusing our survivor’s guilt?! Take a look at yourself, Heather!”

“I have. And I know I’m right.”

Guilt Heather whirled around in rage and aimed a kick at the steel chair. She sent it skidding across the floor of her empty little room, but it hit the wall with nary a clink of metal, as if she was too drained for real violence.

She stood there for a moment, shoulders rising and falling, shaking with uneven breath, face hidden behind the smooth metallic bone of the squid-skull mask. The cold blinking lights and empty-faced displays in the computers and control consoles along the walls dyed her Cygnet-issue pajamas all the sunless colours of the ocean floor. Not one of her Empty Guards moved forward to assist her, nor offered a single word of comfort.

Across the tenuous connection of the hand-held radio, over the background hiss of static, almost blotted out by the sound of my Foolish Counterpart having a tantrum, I heard the unmistakable crack-bang-crack-bang of gunfire, echoing off metal and glass. The fire fight was suddenly punctured by a long, loud, low hissssss!

The Other Me jerked upward in alarm.

“That’s us!” I cried into the hand-held radio. “That’s us, our tentacles, our other six selves! Homo abyssus! And you’re shooting at them, too! Just like with Tenny! You can’t help yourself, can you?”

I repressed a sigh of relief, despite the accusation in my words; if she was actively rejecting the help of our other six self-facets, that gave me time and space in which to work.

Still, I was shocked. She was so bitter she would reject help even from herself — myself, ourselves. She was worse than I’d thought.

“I’m not,” she said, her voice oddly weak. “I’m not trying to hurt them, I’m just keeping them away from the exits. Heather, I don’t have the words or the time to explain this properly, you just have to take a leap of faith — we cannot free Maisie by forcing the Box open. Eileen — tch!” She tutted and huffed. “The Eye, it has to die. It’s the only way.”

“There is no sure foundation set on blood,” I quoted at her. “No certain life achieved by others’ death.”

“King John, really!?” she scoffed. “You’re scraping the bottom of the barrel with that one, Heather. Nobody even reads King John, it’s terrible. I don’t know why we read it!”

“Because we actually quite enjoyed it?”

Foolish Me sighed. “I ... yes, I ... suppose we did.”

“See?” I said. “We’re still the same person, once all this dream is done. You must know I won’t be able to accept murdering Eileen. I would never submit to that solution. I’d never forgive you — which means I’d never forgive myself. And you wouldn’t be able to forgive yourself, either. I think you’re blinded by your biases, your loneliness, and your fear. You have to know I’m right about this, Heather. Please.”

The Other Me, still tucked safely behind her squid-skull mask, sagged inside her pajamas, shoulders slumping, back hunching. She let out an exhausted sigh, a rattle like a final breath. She didn’t have the energy to stagger across the room to retrieve the chair; she simply slumped against the steel desk.

Did I almost have her? Was she finally crumbling?

“Heather,” I said. “Please, just stop the fighting. Call off your Guards, let the Box open. Stop shooting at Tenny, send your Guards to help the others against the nurses instead. You and I, we’re the same person, we shouldn’t be at odds like this. Let me come and find you, and we can do this together.”

For a moment, Lonely Heather contracted further; she raised one hand as if about to remove her squid-skull mask.

“That’s it,” I said into the radio. “Just show me your face. It’s my face too, after all.”

Her hand dropped away.

“ ... Heather?” I said. “Please, just ... ”

She reached into her pocket and extracted a little round dot of matter. Dark grey, featureless, about the size of a finger bone. She held it up before the eye sockets of the mask.

“What’s that?” I said.

“Huh,” she laughed, sad and abandoned. “And you have the gall to accuse me of forgetting promises. Of betraying friends. Of being false.”

“What are you talking about? I haven’t forgotten anything! In fact, I’m hyper-aware that I couldn’t find the Forest Knight, or Maisie’s new body, or Mister Squiddy, when I was doing my little survey just now. And I strongly suspect you have something to do with that, you—”

“Oh yes,” she said, so soft and defeated, so fragile and exhausted — yet somehow the mournful certainty in her words stopped me dead. “You can’t forget the important people, the ones who’ve helped you so much, the ones you love, the ones who make you smile and make you happy, the ones who protect you with strong arms and a warm embrace. But what about the ones who don’t, or the ones who can’t?” She held up the little speck of grey. “What about the forgotten people, the things too small to be regarded? What about those, Heather? Do they matter as well?”

“... what is that?” I repeated. “What are you holding?”

Sentimental Heather closed her fist around the little speck of grit. “A pebble,” she said. “And you forgot all about it.”

I wracked my brains, trying to figure out what metaphor or—

“It’s not a metaphor, Heather,” she said. “It’s a pebble. An actual, physical pebble, from Earth. It doesn’t represent anything. It’s literal. One object unchanged by the dream.”

“Where did you get it?”

“We sent it here. Outside, to Wonderland. Months and months ago now. We were experimenting with Slipping objects, after we returned from Evelyn’s home down in Sussex. Don’t you remember?” Her voice began to quiver. “We lay awake in bed for so many nights, agonising over the fate of this one little pebble. We plucked it from a lakeside in rural England, and we sent it Outside. Eternal exile, eternally lost. And we believed it would never, ever, ever be found and rescued. Who would find something so small, so pointless, so unfeeling, in all the scorched and burned geography of Wonderland?”

“Oh!” It all came rushing back to me. “I do remember, of course I share those memories, of course—”

“But I never forgot,” she said, her melancholy tone rising with wounded bitterness, knuckles turning white around the forgotten pebble in her fist. “I never forgot about even a single pebble—”

“Neither did I!” I cried out. “Neither did I! Heather, this doesn’t make any sense. What are you trying to say, you—”

“I found this pebble, you see,” she said, slow and sharp and laced with poison. “I found it inside the Box. And it started me down a very specific path of thought. What do you think the Box is for? Why do you think it’s here? Why do you think the world forgot all about Maisie, and only Maisie?”

I sighed. I couldn’t hold back my frustration; I’d had just about enough of her cryptical guilt-tripping and sanctimonious preaching. Was this really what I sounded like? Wallowing in loneliness and righteousness? Hiding behind my mask, while advocating for murder? An ugly little morsel of mollusc-flesh dripping with toxin and poison in every word? Was this what my friends saw and heard when they looked at me? A beached cephalopod, obsessed with gravel?

“I don’t know,” I said. “I don’t know what the Box is for. Why don’t you just tell me?”

“Because you should know!” the Other Me shouted down the radio. She thumped the steel desk with her fist; she must have been gripping the pebble with all her might, because I saw blood leaking from between her fingers. “Because you should have been thinking about Maisie, and the pebble, and everything that doesn’t matter! Because she’s a forgotten thing, too! And because apparently you won’t listen anyway! You’ve already given up on me, given up on Maisie too, given up on—”

“Oh, do shut up,” I huffed. “Stop giving yourself conniptions!”

Was this what it would feel like listening to myself, once we recombined? Would Maisie have to hear this voice, see this face, witness this part of me? What would she see, reflected in my eyes?

And she — I — still did not shut up.

"I thought you would understand," she whined, beginning to sob. "After all the time you and I have spent protecting each other, all the lost years, all the Slips and dreams and nightmares. I was always there when you needed me—"

"I don't need your way of thinking," I snapped. "Attacking Tenny, attacking our other selves. And trying to kill Eileen!"

"—and you were always there when I needed you, too! And now, what is this? When I need you the most, when Maisie needs us both more than—"

"Stop!" I snapped. "Just. Stop. Talking. Your voice is making me sick."

She finally stopped.

On the wall of monitors, a hundred eyeballs across, she sagged at the waist and curled up against her steel desk, as if holding back fresh tears. She looked as if she wanted to drop to the floor and curl into a sobbing, broken ball, shutting out the world and pretending none of this was her fault. Alone and lonely, without any support but the mirages she had conjured from dreams, without any direction but the rot in her heart. I felt bile rising up my throat, how could I ever have been so—

You shouldn't hate her, said somebody.

A tiny voice spoke from somewhere beyond my sight; for a moment I didn't realise what it was, for there was nothing in the world except the wall of monitors, the radio in my hand, and Her, Myself, I, in all my nasty, pitiful, spiteful glory.

Then I realised the voice was Praem. She was out there, in the space my physical body still occupied, back in the Governor's Office.

Praem said good girls should not hate themselves. She suggested I be kinder, for my own sake.

A lump of horrified guilt hardened in my throat, almost like I'd been slapped across the cheek and snapped out of some terrible downward spiral.

Praem was correct, of course. Why was I being so nasty to myself? Why was I being, in words my beloved Evelyn might have applied to her own self, such a bitch to this reflection of my own mind? This wasn't Alexander Lilburne, or Ooran Juh, or an unrepentant member of the Sharrowford Cult, or Edward being vile and unredeemable. This was me, lonely and afraid. She didn't need me calling her names and spitting on her efforts to help — no matter how misguided and stupid.

She needed a hug.

I composed myself as best I could. I took a deep breath and forced myself to smile before I spoke into the hand-held radio.

"Heather," I said, gentle and soft. "Heather, if you're that tired, and afraid, and lonely, then you don't have to be alone anymore. Let me protect you again. Let me—"

"You think there's no value in me," she whined, voice quivering something akin to terror. "If I let you protect me now, there'll be nothing left of me."

"... I'm sorry?"

"Let every eye negotiate for itself and trust no agent," she quoted, between gritted teeth.

I swallowed a sigh, reminding myself this was me and she needed help. "Love looks not with the eyes, but with the mind, And therefore is winged Cupid painted blind."

"And what is that one supposed to mean in this context?"

I held back another note. "It means that we shouldn't be arguing like this. We've been blinded by being able to have this argument in the first place. We should be together, not apart. Let me protect you again."

"Un-thread the rude eye of rebellion, and welcome home again discarded faith?" she quoted back at me, dripping with scorn. "You just want me to give up and submit!"

I bit my lips to hold my temper, then said: "Get thee glass eyes, and like a scurvy politician, seem to see the things thou dost not."

"Oh, so now I'm imagining it all?!" she snapped. "You know who you sound like? You sound just like mum! They whose guilt within their bosom lies, imagine every eye beholds their blame."

"I'm not projecting!" I said. "You're projecting! And this is pointless, I'm still not going to let you kill Eileen. You cannot make gross sins look clear: To revenge is no valour, but to bear."

“Ha!” she spat. “Kindness nobler ever than revenge? Perhaps you should practice what you preach!”

“What are you talking about?” I demanded. “You can’t seriously be worried I’m going to take revenge on you. You’re me! I’m you!”

“If I let you in — if I let you take control of the asylum — you’ll stuff me in a cell,” she said, beginning to sob again. “You’ll lock me up, just like our real mother did, just like everyone else wants to. That’s what your protection would mean now. You think I’m useless, you—”

“I don’t!” I whined, barely able to believe my ears. “You’re delusional, you—”

“If I let you in, you’ll kill me.”

All my carefully constrained temper burst forth in one almighty sigh — and She, I, Me, The Little Fool on the other end of the call, had the gall to flinch!

“Don’t be so absolutely ridiculous!” I snapped. “I’ve never heard such stupid—”

“You think I’m completely wrong—”

“—nonsense in my entire life, and that’s saying something—”

“—about everything! You forgot the pebble and you’ll forget—”

“—in this absurd dream. You are the most absurd thing in here, you —”

“—me too! You’ll forget me and abandon me and we’ll never free Maisie that way and—”

“—snivelling little bloodthirsty coward!”

“—both of us will die!”

“That’s it!” I shouted into the radio handset. “I’ve had enough of you!”

And with that, I truly lost my temper.

Before I realised the impulse I was following, I reached out toward the wall of monitors with my free hand — toward her, toward the smooth grey metal of the Outsider squid-skull mask on her head. My own body felt like a vessel piloted by another mind, as if my hand entered my field of vision without my volition. Held between my thumb and first two fingers was a little white cylinder — the stick of chalk I had inherited from Eileen.

Hyperdimensional mathematics, wrought in dreamlike metaphor.

I did not need to know what I was doing, because this was a dream, and the dream would bend to the will of a lucid mind.

The tip of the chalk-stick touched the wall of monitors — then reached through, into that dark little steel room which the Other Me had made into a cage for her mind. The chalk slipped past her shoulders and shot toward the computers along the wall, jabbing at the hollow buttons and cold lights of the control panels. My hand swished and flicked, drawing white lines and symbols, writing brain-math in chalk on the substrate of the dream, exerting intention, willpower, and determination. Chalk-marks on the monitor threw switches and levers, turned dials and knobs, changed values and numbers and sent the systems of the Box spinning off into chaos.

Bitter Little Me shot upright and spun around in panic. “No! No, Heather, no, don’t!”

She lurched for the control panels, watched by her impassive, empty-faced line of Guards; she couldn’t walk properly, drained to near-disability by sheer exhaustion. But terror gave her impetus, and she flung herself onto the controls. Her free hand scrabbled over the buttons and switches, reversing my changes, fighting my willpower, scrambling to keep the Box shut, to keep Maisie in prison.

For several seconds we struggled on opposite sides of the screen. I jabbed and scribbled with my chalk, messing with the buttons, opening gates, and cancelling security lock downs. She scrambled to keep up with me, putting things back the way they were, hands slapping at the controls, slamming levers back into place, jamming buttons into their sockets to prevent further mischief.

Then she fumbled; a tiny grey mote tumbled from her open hand — the pebble, falling to the floor, rolling away.

“No!” she yelped.

Silly Little Me threw herself after the forgotten speck of grit. She hit the floor, landing hard, dazed and winded, squid-skull mask bouncing off the steel plates. But she managed to slap her palm down on the pebble, just before it was lost beneath one of those cold, unfeeling machines.

I took the opening and finished the equation.

I cancelled all the lock downs, opened all the gates, and threw the Box wide. I took away her control.

The lights in the little steel room flickered, plunging my Unwise Counterpart into stop-motion darkness. She scrambled upright, struggling to regain her feet, bloody fist closed around the pebble. Across the radio, from far away, I heard a triumphant hissssssss! The hiss was followed by a deafening thump-crack-clang of metal, then a ripping and tearing sound like a car torn open by steel jaws. My other six selves, free and wild!

I was vaguely aware of a flinch at my side — Eileen, looking up and around. A muttered exchange passed somewhere beyond the screens, behind my physical body — Zalu and Xiyu, snapping back and forth.

That sound had not only been heard over the radio, but out in the hospital, for real.

“Heather, no!” the other me wailed, a metal-faced ghost beneath failing lights. “What have you done?! They’re going to get out, they’re going to get free!”

“Good!” I shouted into the radio. “Good! You deserve to see this nonsense fail, you—”

Past the shuddering shoulders of Defeated Me, the vast dark shape behind the frosted glass shifted and coiled. I slammed to a halt. That couldn’t be Maisie.

“Oh no,” she said. “No, no, no, this is all wrong, this is all wrong!”

Lying and Cheating Heather started to retreat into a corner, backing away from the glass, away from her soldiers, away from my unseen vantage point all around her. She stumbled over her feet, chest rising and falling with hyperventilating panic, masked head flicking left and right. A hissssss came from somewhere closer by, perhaps just outside the room. Other Heather raised a hand to gesture to her remaining row of Empty Soldiers, but then she almost fumbled the pebble again, clasping it to her chest in desperation. Her fist left a smear of blood on the front of her Cygnet-issue pajamas.

“Just leave me— leave me— leave me alone, Heather, leave me— leave me alone, leave me—”

I drew a circle around her, around her hidden face, around the unreadable grey metal of the squid-skull mask.

And then I pulled it from her head.

The mask came off and landed in my lap — my actual, physical lap, here in the Governor’s Office — a sudden feathery weight which barely registered. Somebody else — Praem perhaps — reached out to prevent the mask from slipping off my legs and falling to the floor. I was so absorbed in the spectacle of myself, suddenly denuded of her protection, forced to show her face when she advocated for murder.

She was vile.

She screamed as the mask came away, dropping both the pebble and the radio handset as she swiped at the air, groping for the return of her shell and refuge. But her hands closed on nothing; her safety was mine now. Tears ran down cheeks flushed red with shame and self-loathing — both well justified. Her face — my face, the same face I saw in a mirror every morning, the same face I saw in still water and the bowl of a spoon and reflected in the eyes of those I loved — twisted with agonised tears. Thin lips, hollow cheeks, greasy hair. Eyes the colour of muddy-grey skies, brimming over with liar’s salt.

Something about those tears was so ugly. Was this really me? Did I really look like that?

Did Maisie look like that, when she cried?

“Don’t— hic, don’t look at me, don’t look—” she whined and sobbed, dropping into a crouch and shielding her face and head with her arms, trying to withdraw into a shell I had taken from her. “No, no, please, no, not again, no, no— don’t—hic— don’t—”

Bile rushed up my throat — disgust and shame burning my oesophagus, burning my words to nothing. Tears prickled in my eyes.

She was ugly and pitiful, but she was still me.

So why was I treating myself like this?

“W-wait,” I stammered. “Wait. I didn’t mean to— I’m— I didn’t mean to hurt—”

“You did!” she screamed, emerging from behind her arms. “You did!”

Suddenly every view in the wall of monitors was a close-up of her, of me, of our shared face, flushed and tear-streaked and ugly with such bone-deep bitterness. Her eyes were brown; her eyes were blue-grey.

I reached out one quivering hand, an apology on my lips.

Then she spat: “All I’ve done is try to help! All I’ve done is for you! And for you, she has to die! Eileen has to die!”

The apology died on my lips.

“Heat not a furnace for your foe so hot that it do singe yourself,” I said. “You’re wrong.”

She screamed.

The wall of monitors became a wall of her screams — my scream, my face, streaked with tears, distraught in abandonment and disbelief and isolation, a scream of frustration and self-betrayal howling from the black plastic radio in my hand.

That scream was like a shove; I tumbled off the lofty pedestal of observation and slammed back into my own body with a hard, sharp, convulsive flinch. I jerked against the cradle of the observation throne, suddenly panting for breath, surrounded by the walls of the Governor’s office, nothing more than a young woman staring at a bank of monitors.

A wave of gut-wrenching pain quivered through my bruised abdomen. My wounded left shin was on fire, pajama leg stuck to my skin with fresh blood. Pain-sweat broke out on my face. I gasped for breath, drowning in my own flesh.

“To hell, allegiance!” Other Heather screamed. “Vows, to the blackest devil! Conscience, and grace, to the profoundest pit! I dare damnation: To this point I stand,— That both the worlds I give to negligence, Let come what comes; only I’ll be reveng’d.”

“S-stop,” I gasped. “Stop, I’m— I’m sorry—”

A weak, pale, limp little fist lashed out toward me.

The single monitor directly before my face went dead, dark, black as a mirror of night.

The rest of the wall of monitors flickered back to the hundred views of the unfolding revolution inside Cygnet Asylum, as if a broadcast interruption had just ended. Regular programming resumed. Your scheduled drama, back on air.

A final line hissed from the black plastic radio in my hand.

“I won’t let you cage me,” said Lonely Heather.

The line went dead.

Crash landing back into my own body was not a pleasant experience, even if this was ‘only’ a dream. The combined pain of my leg and my gut was enough to bring a veil of fresh tears to my eyes. I wheezed for breath, fighting down both the whirling vertigo aftermath of such focused observation, and the strange hollow alienation from my other self, my poor, lonely, little self, who I had left behind in that steel-shod room.

Had I abandoned her? Had I betrayed her?

Just like I had abandoned Maisie to Wonderland?

My clammy fingers struggled to hold the slender stick of chalk; the little radio tumbled from my other hand and bounced off the squid-skull mask in my lap. Praem caught it before it could fall.

Eileen was saying my name — “Heather? Heather? Heather?” — while the twins to my rear snapped out, “Ma’am? Ma’am, are you in need of assistance? Ma’am?”

Beyond those three voices lay the distant roar and rumble of the revolution, the hundred riots unfolding in the hospital beneath us: shouts and screams, rallying cries, calls for aid, the clang and clash of metal-on-metal, the breaking of wooden barricades, the thunder of feet racing down corridors, the lightning of fists on flesh. From beyond the walls, far away on the other side of the asylum grounds, more lethal background noises filled the air — the revving of engines, the pseudo-fake boom-boom of toys pretending to be big guns, all punctuated by the ‘prrrt-prrrrt!’ trilling of one giant moth-girl on her lucid rampage.

But all of it turned to white noise in my ears, blurred to static by a wall of tears.

All I could see was the weeping face before me, ugly and nasty, twisted by pain and bitterness, by self-hate and survivor's loathing.

For a moment it was Her, Lonely Heather, the Other Me. Then it was Maisie, an impossible close-up view of her hanging in her aquarium tank, struggling against the bonds of steel and pressure. But how could Maisie be so ugly? How could my twin sister look so cruel and full of shame?

Then I realised I was staring at my own face, reflected in the dark mirror of a blank screen.

A hand fell on my shoulder and squeezed hard.

I brought myself around with a great heave of breath, dragging a sleeve across my tear-filled eyes. I looked up into Eileen's curious face. She stared back down at me with her own wide and questioning gaze, clear of sorrow, but wracked by alarm and worry and a thousand-fold cares.

"Heather," she said. "What do we do now?"

Two other voices piped up from behind me, mirrors of each other. "Ma'am, we need orders."

"She'll be sending a squad to this location."

"We have to move."

"Ma'am, by your command."

"Uh, um ... " I swallowed, my mouth so dry, my head pounding with each throb of my heart. I couldn't get my bearings. Observation had been like a drug, and here was withdrawal. "I ... I ... "

I hesitated, mired deep in doubt.

If the Other Heather, the one tucked away inside the Box and commanding these Empty Guards, was the 'Lonely Me', then what was I? What part of me was sitting there, in this dream-body, wracked with pain, bleeding from her leg, bruised in the gut, curled up in an observation throne? If she was Lonely, wallowing in her isolation, then was I the part that refused loneliness? Was I the part that placed faith in others, the part that never gives up on my friends, the part which still believed, despite all odds, that we can and will overcome anything, all for the sake of rescuing Maisie, and rescuing each other?

Whatever part I was, I was filled with guilt and worse.

Was my judgement just as clouded?

Doubt could not be entertained, however; I shook my head and took a deep breath, simply because I could not afford it, not if I was going to win. The revolution was still salvageable. Everyone in the dream could still be saved, all my friends and the patients too. These machinations by some Bitter and Spiteful part of me could be defeated. We would be whole again, and Maisie would be free.

“Give me a second,” I wheezed, turning back to the wall of monitors.

The screen directly before me was still blank. I kept my eyes away from that one, terrified of seeing my own ugly, tear-streaked face again and mistaking it for Maisie. But all the other screens showed countless views of the hospital corridors and the unfolding violence. The revolution was guttering and stuttering now, like a candle in a cold, dark wind.

I selected a single screen — one miniature drama, one representative scene among the dozens of confrontations and barricades and headlong charges.

A grainy CCTV feed showed a dead-end corridor, somewhere high up in the hospital. A scrum of a dozen patients stood shoulder-to-shoulder, barring the end of the corridor. Most of them were armed with makeshift weapons — table legs, bits of broken chair, a crowbar, a snapped-off length of pipe — while two more used an upturned table as a barricade. Some of them were wounded, blood running from shallow cuts or grazes. Cygnet-issue pajamas were dirty and scuffed. Eyes were narrowed and set. Behind the line a smaller gaggle of younger girls huddled for protection — patients who couldn’t fight, who weren’t old enough or bold enough to be part of the front line, though some of them held bricks or shouted encouragement. But several of them were clinging to each other in open fear, crying and screaming. They knew they were cornered, with nowhere to run.

A flood of nurses was bearing down on the little group — four, five, six dozen shambling monsters of sagging grey, crammed into ragged white uniforms, brandishing straitjackets and plastic cuffs and hypodermic needles and stun batons and nylon rope. They filled the corridor like a flood of sewage, with no gaps in their formation.

As I watched, a brick sailed out from behind the line of patients and smashed into the skull of one of the nurse-monsters, cracking bone and pulping flesh. The monster rocked back, collapsing from the impact. A cheer went up in celebration — then died away as the nurse-monster straightened back up and continued her shuffling advance, alongside so many others.

The line of patients braced themselves for a fight. But no matter how gallant and courageous, they would be overwhelmed by sheer numbers within moments. The line would fall, and the more vulnerable girls behind them would be taken away and locked up, drugged and bound, and left alone in the dark.

Tears threatened my eyes again. Just like the Lonely Heather I had shouted and screamed at.

I raised the stick of chalk and reached toward the screen.

Clink.

The screen was just glass. The chalk was just chalk.

That scream of rejection from Bitter Sad Lonely Heather had robbed us of even this pale imitation of brain-math.

“No!” I hissed, leaning forward in frustration, jabbing at the little screen. But the chalk just went clink-clink-clink. I twisted in the seat and almost winded myself by pulling at the bruise in my guts. I held the chalk out to Eileen. “Can you do it?!” I snapped. “Can you reach through, with hyperdimensional mathematics, and help them? Please!”

Eileen looked at the chalk, then at the screen, then back at the chalk, then at me.

“I cannot,” she said. “I have relinquished my authority. I assumed you would be able to assume.”

“Tch!” I hissed in frustration. “Not any more! I’m— I’m at war with myself! Neither of us has control! We’ve rejected each other!”

Eileen nodded, then said, “Then I am useless.”

“What? No, no, you’re not, don’t say that.”

“Ma’am,” said one of the Twins. “Ma’am, we cannot stay here. You were right about that part. We have to move. Ma’am?”

The six empty eye holes of my squid-skull mask stared up from my lap, ringed with protective bone-ridges. The awkward horizontal mouth-slash told me nothing. The flared skirt of bone seemed to suggest a pattern, and within that pattern, a solution. The metallic surface caught the light from the screens, reflecting back an oil-gloss kaleidoscope of colour.

To Her, The Other Me, this mask was protection and refuge.

What was it to me?

“Eileen,” I croaked. “Turn the chair around, please.”

Eileen did as I asked, applying just enough pressure to make the observation throne turn on the massive ball-and-socket joint set into the floor. The chair swung away from the wall of monitors, to face the rest of the Governor’s Office.

Zalu and Xiyu, in their dream-guise special forces role, waited with their hands on their shiny black guns and their hair up in non-matching ponytails, their feet planted amid the oil-leaking bodies of the empty guards. Behind them, the window was streaming with the cold light of a cloudy day, dawn finally tucked away behind the leaden sky — though there was no sky and no clouds, only the narrow visible sliver of the Eye, Eileen’s true body, staring down at the dream with an open slit of magnesium-silver.

To the right was the door of the office, our only way out, still barred with a filing cabinet. To the left was the other desk, littered with blank papers.

The severed head of Horror the head nurse sat in the middle of that desk, blindfolded and deafened and gagged, wrapped up tight in an old towel.

“Ma’am?” said one of the Twins. “What is your plan?”

I couldn’t answer — not because my throat was raw and half my consciousness was pain, but because the plan was abstract, a dream-thing, a set of actions which only made sense in the context of my own ancient traumas and lifelong preoccupations.

The stick of chalk went back inside my yellow blanket, followed by the insignia patch with the crowned and haloed head of Foolish And Murderous Heather; I told myself it was not 'cool' at all, but a seed of doubt in my chest was still a little impressed. The radio I left to Praem. She might find better use of it than I could.

Moving even that much, to stow the symbols of the dream, drew awful pain from my gut and a deep throbbing from my leg. My wound was bleeding through the stitches now, and my gut quivered and shook, sending waves of nausea up through my throat. But I kept moving. I needed to finish this on my own terms, and deal with myself.

I took my Outsider squid-skull mask from my lap, raised it with both hands, and lowered it over my head.

For a moment I was enclosed in warm metallic darkness, blind as in the womb. A familiar scent teased at my nose, of familiar skin and hair beneath my hand, of laying my head on my own pillow in bed, of stripping off my clothes and catching the smell of my own body. That scent was me, or her, or both of us, combined in one inside this mask. For a moment, as the safe enclosure of the mask slipped down over my face, I knew how she felt, I knew what she had felt, wearing this, feeling invincible, feeling right.

She was so silly to be afraid of me. Wasn't she?

Then I opened my eyes and stared out from the eye holes of the squid-skull mask. The metal felt like a second skin, like my own fresh-grown carapace of iron-infused bone and chitin. The pain in my leg and gut seemed to finally recede, the morphine in my blood finally working properly.

Eileen watched with a curious look in her wide eyes. Zalu and Xiyu shared a glance, mystified by my behaviour. Praem cautioned, but about what, she could not explain.

I raised a hand and gestured at the other desk. "Would one of you be so kind as to pass Horror to me, please?"

Zalu and Xiyu shared another glance.

"Has she lost her equilibrium?" one of them said.

"Can we trust her judgement and her orders?"

"I'm not sure, sister."

“True.”

“But you heard what the other one of her said.”

“We heard it all. Which parts?”

“Heather and Heather are the only powers left in control of the dream.”

“Which means if we don’t help one, the other will probably win.”

“That assumption places too much faith in our prowess.”

“Does it?”

“Does it indeed.”

I cleared my throat. “I promise I have a plan. And you heard what Nasty Me—” I paused. “The other me, I mean. You heard what she said about Horror’s head. We have to save the revolution, then I have to stop her, stop myself. Now, please. You’re right that we don’t have much time. I have to take control.”

Zalu shrugged. Xiyu nodded. Zalu walked over to the other desk and picked up Horror’s severed head, dangling by a loop of towel, then crossed back to me.

For a moment she just held the head out, blindfolded and gagged, jaw still trying to wriggle, facial muscles twitching.

“Where do you want her, Ma’am?”

“Put her in my lap, please,” I said. “I can handle her now.”

Zalu lowered Horror’s head into my lap. The severed stump of the neck squished against my thighs. I almost shivered at the disgusting sensation, but the refuge of my squid-skull mask fortified me against almost anything.

Zalu stepped back. I stared down at Horror through the mask’s many eye holes, then reached out and began to unwrap this wriggling package of human head.

First I pulled the gag from her mouth. The moment the towel was out, she retched and heaved and worked her lips up and down.

“Ugh! Ugh ugh ugh! Do you even know what it’s like to have a piece of cloth jammed in your mouth for that long?!” she said, jaw jerking at my thighs. “Heather? Heather, my dear girl, I know that’s you unwrapping me. I can tell by your touch, you're always so tentative and— ow!”

I yanked on the length of towel as I unbound her ears.

“You were saying?” I said.

“I ... I said I can tell it's you,” Horror went on, jaw flapping up and down in my lap. “You're so tentative and gentle. I know none of this is really your fault, Heather. I know that you can find it in you to be a good girl again and do as you're told. All this mess can be put right, all this violence and strife can be put behind us, all this —”

“I am a good girl,” I said. “I've always been a good girl. It's something I'm too good at, in fact.”

Horror hesitated. “H-Heather? You ... you sound ... ”

I removed the blindfold from Horror's deep blue eyes. She blinked several times, then looked up at the Outsider squid-skull mask. She froze, tongue and jaw finally stilled.

I finished unwrapping the towel, grabbed a fistful of her blonde hair, and lifted her so she hung before my face, before my mask, before what I had determined to do.

“ ... Heather?” she squeaked.

“You have no power over me anymore,” I said. “You're finished now, Horror.”

“Wha— how— you—”

I sighed inside my mask, then leaned forward, closed my eyes, and tapped my forehead against hers.

“Because I accept you,” I whispered. “You are part of me. All my old traumas, all my hatred and bitterness about medical treatment, all the injustice that my parents put me through without realising. I can't pretend you aren't part of me, can't pretend I'll ever truly be rid of you, because that would be like opening a wound to get rid of a scar. It simply doesn't work like that.”

“ ... uh ... n-no, no,” she murmured. “You have to be a g-good girl, come back to ... to your room, and ... ”

I leaned back again, so I could look her in the eyes.

"I am the one in control," I said. "You don't rule me. You don't make decisions for me. And you don't put me in a cell."

Horror swallowed; how she achieved that with only a stub of her throat, I had no idea, but I wasn't going to start questioning the wisdom of the dream at this late hour.

"I am in charge of us," I said. "Do you understand?"

Horror wobbled. I realised with a little smirk that she was trying to nod.

"Say it," I said.

"You are in charge," she echoed. "You are in charge."

"Good," I said. "Now, you're going to do as you're told."

I lowered the head for now; I would need her shortly, but we had to get moving first.

"Eileen," I said, looking up at her pinkly glowing eyes. "I need you to carry me, like you did before. And for a much longer time. I need you for this, and I think you're the only one who can do it."

"Ah," said Eileen. She blinked. "I am filled with use again?"

"You were never useless," I said. "Nobody else can do this. I need you to carry me." Then I turned to Zalu and Xiyu. "And you two, I need you to defend Eileen and I."

"And I," said Eileen.

I almost laughed, high on the potential of my plan. Zalu and Xiyu both sighed, not quite in unison.

"Eileen and myself, then," I said. "Yes, I know, the first time was grammatically incorrect. Eileen is rubbing off on me or something. Eileen and me."

"Boo," said Eileen.

"This isn't the time for puns."

"It is always a good time for the best of puns."

Eileen got into position as she spoke, crouching down next to the observation throne so that I might once again climb onto her back, to be carried piggyback style. Praem helped me lever my quivering body out of the chair, and dragged me over to Eileen. We worked together to prop me up, with one arm around Eileen's front, my thighs braced in her hands, and my other hand holding Horror's head by her hair, ready to raise my grisly trophy.

"Are you prepared?" Eileen said.

"Yes. Do it."

Eileen stood up, carrying me on her back. My guts roiled, but then settled. I cast one last glance at the wall of monitors, one last temptation at the power of observation.

Then Eileen turned us away, and I dragged my eyes to the door.

Xiyu leapt into action, pulling the filing cabinet out of the way.

Zalu said: "We can protect you, Heather. Seven Shades of Sunlight would have us in the dock if we didn't. But we need to know the plan. You need to give clear orders. What's our objective?"

I pulled myself as upright as I could on Eileen's back, fighting the pain in my belly and the blood dripping from the cuff of my pajama bottoms. Horror's head swung from my sweaty fist.

"Save the revolution," I said. "Tear down the institution. Take control. Or end control."

Xiyu got the filing cabinet away from the door. She let the door hang wide, showing the corridor beyond, lit by cold, grey, late-morning light. She shouldered her gun and peered out, left and right, checking our path.

"Sure thing," said Zalu. "But what's our immediate objective? Where are you going, Heather? With what purpose?"

I raised Horror's mute head in one quivering fist; her eyes were wide with submissive terror.

"To the nearest group of patients," I said. "To accept all my traumas."

bedlam boundary – 24.32

We left the Governor's Office behind — finally forgoing the twin temptations of observation and archives, both made obsolete by determination and resolve — and stepped back into the labyrinthine corridors of Cygnet Asylum.

Sickly grey dawn-light flooded the corridors, oozing through banks of grimy windows, staining the floors with a pallid sheen, as if the hospital herself were growing nauseated by the rotten ruction within her walls. The tumult of the revolution echoed upward through the floors, like the roiling in the guts of a great beast awakening from unquiet dreams. Shouts and screams and wild howls trickled off down long corridors, muffled by the maze of whitewash and sturdy doors, voices lost in a deep, dark, briar-choked canyon. Clashing and charging, cries of lost defeat, clarions of brief victory — all was reduced to a ghostly murmur, locked away in a forgotten cell.

“Hurry!” I panted over Eileen's shoulder. “We have to hurry up! We can't let any of them get overwhelmed!”

“Moving as fast as we can, Ma'am,” Zalu shot back over her shoulder. “We're not exactly set up for rapid insertion right now. Covering you is priority.”

I tutted inside my squid-skull mask.

The Twins — Zalu and Xiyu, in their dream-guise of video game special forces soldiers — were ‘taking point’, as Raine would so accurately say. Twin submachine guns like shiny, spiky, glisten-backed beetles were tucked tight against Twin shoulders, hungry twin barrel-mouths sweeping over doorways and passages as we passed. The Twins' non-matching ponytails swished and bounced as they leapfrogged each others' positions, hurrying ahead to make sure we didn't blunder face-first into any stray nurses. The display of ‘small unit tactics’ was all very impressive, full of dash and competence and accompanied by both Twins doing very odd things with the angles at which they held their guns, but to my uneducated opinion it was rather a waste of time when we should have been sprinting.

“More haste,” Eileen said, “less speed. Is this a paradox, or a riddle? I cannot decide. Perhaps I would enjoy riddles.”

“You probably will do,” I muttered.

Eileen was carrying me in the most stable piggyback I had ever experienced, with both hands braced firm and strong beneath my thighs, though I will readily admit that I did not have many other examples with which to compare. My ‘real’ mother, Samantha Morell, had never been the sort of person who would smudge her image by carrying me like that, though my father had done so a few times, when Maisie and I had been quite small. Despite my size — for I was no longer a child, even with my five foot nothing of height — Eileen strode with unbent back, each step sure and certain.

Praem helped, of course. Peeking out from the front of my yellow blanket, she anchored me to Eileen with all the considerable strength a plushie could muster.

I rode with my head high and my yellow blanket draped down my back like a conqueror’s cloak; I did my best to ignore the pain in my left shin and the awful bruise still blossoming across my abdomen, sending little waves of barbed torment deep into my guts with every flex and tilt.

The squid-skull mask made it easy. The metallic face muffled the pain and lent me focus, better than any opiate in the blood.

Horror’s severed head led the way, whispering directions as she dangled from my fist.

“Down those stairs, around to the right, one flight down. Then take the first left, not the second. Past the row of x-ray rooms, yes, that’s correct. Best not open those doors—” I turned her at that imprecision and implication, so she faced the six dark eye holes of my squid-skull mask, staring deep into her watery blues. She flinched. “No, that’s not a cruel joke!” she cried out. “I didn’t mean — I just— No, no, Heather, I was only — y-yes, yes, down this corridor, another left, and then— there! Right there! See? I’m telling you the truth, Heather. I’m telling you the whole truth. You’re in charge. You are.”

Horror’s whisper trailed off, drowned out by the sudden roar of the revolution bursting back to full volume before us — the shout and cry of patients fighting, the slam and slap of blunt objects striking flesh, the squeal of girls overwhelmed beneath weight of numbers, and the shuffling step of so many nightmare nurses.

Zalu and Xiyu slammed to a halt, bracing their boots, guns flicking forward. Eileen stopped as well, just behind the twin heels of our trigger-eager escorts.

“Stay back, Ma’am!” Zalu snapped.

“This isn’t safe,” said Xiyu. “We’re exposed, sister. Bad position, poor angles. Withdraw?”

“Maybe. Ma’am, that chattering brain-box has led us into a trap. We need fresh orders.”

“No,” I croaked inside my squid-skull mask, fighting against the racing of my heart and the sudden lump in my throat. “She’s done exactly as I wanted. This is where we need to be. This is where we stand.”

Before us lay a sight I recognised from the wall of monitors. This was the place I had attempted to intervene with my brain-math chalk — a dead-end corridor lined on one side by windows as narrow as cracks in bone, and on the other by a row of locked doors like rotten teeth.

Even from the vantage point up on Eileen’s back I could not see the dozen besieged patients at the far end of the corridor, mounting their doomed last stand to protect the ones too weak or young or scared to fight. Six dozen nightmare-wrought zombie-nurses clogged the corridor like a wave of sewage, blocking the way with their misshapen grey backs, clad in torn and tattered uniforms stretched wide by curls of horn and rippling masses of fat-clogged tumour.

A handful of the rearmost nurses began to turn in reaction to our arrival. They stared at us with blank and empty eyes, with orbs on stalks, with ruined sockets, with glassy looks and slack mouths and dripping fangs slathered with yellow-green drool. They were more like something from a cartoon than a true nightmare, rubber-suit monsters too absurd to take seriously by the thin and reedy light of morning. They only made sense in the dark.

But their violence was real enough.

The ripple of recognition spread through the nurses. More of them turned toward us, leaving their vanguard to deal with the patients beyond. They began to shuffle in our direction, raising rope and cuffs and straitjackets and syringes full of bubbling fluid. Jaws yawned wide. Strangler's hands grasped at empty air. The mob formed up and moved to swallow us whole.

Zalu and Xiyu backed away, flicking their guns left and right.

"Ma'am!" one of them snapped. "Permission to open fire?"

"No," I murmured.

"Ma'am?!"

"Permission denied," I said, slipping into the role with far too much ease. The squid-skull mask made it simple; I was in charge. "Do not fire, either of you."

"Ma'am, we need to defend ourselves or reposition! We can't stay here! Ma'am!"

"Eileen," I said — yet could not keep the quiver from my voice.

"Eileen, step forward."

"Ma'am!?" one of the Twins said, moving to block us. "Please, Ma'am, stay behind us, stay where we can protect—"

"And you two stay in the rear," I said. "Follow when you can. You'll know when. Eileen, do it. Step forward!"

Eileen stepped past the Twins. "If only I could have been so forward with the staff," she said. "We could have made some progress."

There was nothing between us and the oncoming nurses now, nothing but twenty feet of bare corridor and whitewashed hospital walls and the sickly cast of morning light through the slit-windows, painting the nurses a deep and dreary grey. Nothing between me and my trauma, no brain-math to save me, no Sevens to leap in swinging her sword, no Raine to grab my shoulders and fuck me stupid until I forgot all about my own past. My trauma — embodied in these nurses — was inflicting itself upon people who had nothing to do with me, who would be overwhelmed by my history, my past, my hatred, my spite, my pain.

She could never have done this, could she? Lonely Heather, Bitter Heather, 'Ruthless' Heather. She would never accept this. Would never understand. Would never take responsibility for—Crick-crack; a great muffled cracking sound filtered up from somewhere deep inside the body of the hospital, miles below Eileen's feet, trapped beneath dozens of floors and shells of metal and oceans of darkness.

Whatever had lurked behind that frosted glass in Lonely Heather's little steel room, it was slowly but surely breaking out.

Nobody else reacted to the cracking sound. Zalu and Xiyu were still holding steady, ready to open fire despite my request. The nurses were shuffling forward, dragging club-like feet studded with jagged claws.

"Are we to wait," Eileen asked, "for their weight to weigh on us?"

"Not quite," I whispered, trying to smile at her newest pun. "Eileen, out in reality, for months and months now, I've been saying that nobody deserves the Eye. I would like to amend that statement. Nobody deserves Cygnet Hospital." I raised Horror's head and held it high, like the trophy of a defeated enemy general. "It's time for me to take responsibility for the dream. Walk forward."

Eileen — to my incredible surprise and endless affection — did not question the seeming madness of my orders.

She strode forward, carrying me into the surging tide.

The wave of nurses crowded toward us, reaching up for me with a dozen clawed hands, clacking plastic wrist-cuffs to capture my ankles, arcing naked needle-points toward my thighs, raising lengths of rope to bind my legs and arms and wrap around my throat. The shambling mass closed around Eileen and I in a ring of grey flesh and greyer uniforms. Their numbers formed a wall. There was no way back.

Horror kept her lips sensibly shut. I held her high, and knew I need not utter any words. All I needed was determination and clarity. The logic had been set. The dream would do the rest.

But in the split-second before the nurses made contact, I felt a speck of doubt worry at my innards.

What if I was wrong? What if I had lied to myself? What if Lonely Heather was right, or at least not entirely incorrect?

Or what if there was some other, third, as-yet unseen force which also held control of the dream? What if the only two players left upon the stage were not I and I, me myself and my Lonely Counterpart? Where, after all, had all these additional nurses originated? Why were their numbers growing, now that the head of the hierarchy had been severed and confined?

Criick-crack went that great glass tank, down at the bedrock of the dream.

What if this was how it ended for me, bound and gagged and drugged and thrown in a cell, forgotten in a dark and lonely place, in the exact way I had been so afraid of spending all my short and brutish years, wasting away to rot and ruin inside the institution? What if the nightmare never ended, the curtain never fell? What if I lost?

Fear forced my heart up into my throat and my sight down toward what I faced; in those vacant drooling nurse-visages I saw every childhood fear, every night in the real Cygnet Hospital, every callous nursing hand, every dismissive doctor, every ignorant word. I saw the many moments in which my parents had listened to the medical professionals, nodding along with analysis which I could not understand, while I had stood there mute and dumb, as if I was a problem to be unpicked and solved and put back together again. I saw the threat of drugs — of anti-psychotics that only made it worse, of misdiagnosis and misunderstanding and mistreatment with the best of intentions. I saw my mother's warning words and chiding comments whenever I 'acted out', and saw the pain in my father's eyes when he caught me weeping all alone. I saw the oh-so-kind explanations that Maisie wasn't real, that I should do my best to forget her, because my fixation and delusion was unhealthy, and I had never had a sister, let alone a twin. I saw the years stretching out inside the confines of a padded cell. I saw death in my early twenties, by suicide or worse. I saw every lesson I had learned in Cygnet, made flesh and horror and hate.

My throat closed up. My skin went ice cold.

In that very last moment, I couldn't do it.

For Maisie I would face the Eye. For Maisie I would forgive Eileen. For my friends and lovers and companions, I would brave Outside and run riot through a revolution. For them I would face down gods and mages and kings and even myself, whatever shape they took and whatever flesh they demanded. For the meanest of forgotten pebbles I would shed blood and tears and rip chunks from my soul.

But Cygnet was a symbol of everything I could not face. As the nurses closed around me, I wanted nothing greater than to turn and run.

Eileen twitched backward, as if she felt my thoughts. But there were nurses in front and behind, and nowhere to go.

I grasped the only thing I had left, the only motivation left which fit the gap — I pictured my Other Self, my Lonely Self, Bitter and Afraid and in need of help. I remembered that the Other Me was alone in a lonely little room, shorn of her protection, without her mask, without friends or allies or a warm hand on her back. She had no Raine, no Evee, no Eileen. I had rejected her, stolen her refuge, and insulted her efforts.

The guilt was poison in my throat; I expelled it with a cry.

Craaaaack went the hidden glass tank, so very far below.

“For me!” I shouted.

The nurses — hands and syringes and claws and cuffs and the fastenings of straitjackets — touched my legs, my feet, my ankles, my hips, my arms, my hands, my fingers pressed to Eileen’s front—
And fell.

Warped hands of greyish sagging flesh recoiled as if plunged into flame, the skin sloughing off and peeling away like ashes in a great wind, revealing the human hands beneath. Syringe-needles broke against my pajamas as if on steel and concrete, cracking and rusting and turning to dust; fluids evaporated, glass shattered, plungers broke. Straitjackets fell apart like the moth-eaten lies they were. Plastic cuffs splintered apart like cheap toys around my ankles. Ropes failed to catch and refused to knot, flailing upward into their wielders’ faces like unruly pythons.

Every nurse who dared to touch me staggered back, monstrous features falling away like so much smoke and mist, or reabsorbed back into their flesh like rocks sinking in swampy water. Uniforms re-knit, stretched taut over human shoulders and human hips. Human eyes blinked and stared, befuddled in human faces. Human legs gave out in exhaustion or shock. Standard nurse name-tags blossomed on chests like little rectangular flowers in plastic.

I raised Horror's head higher, filled my lungs, and shouted, "All of you are mine! Every single one of you! Mine!"

Most nurses collapsed on the spot, staring up at me in abject shock and religious awe, their eyes filling with tears or thrown wide in wordless wonder. More shambling monsters pushed past their collapsed former co-workers, but they fared no better than the first wave, recoiling and transforming at the merest brush of my flesh or clothes — or even just the six-holed stare from my squid-skull mask.

I felt like a Gorgon, my touch and my gaze melting stone back to flesh, forcing the dream to assume a new shape.

"Eileen, carry me forward!"

"So you may hit them upon the heads," Eileen murmured, and strode into the mass of nurses.

We cut through the nurses like wind through grass. Nurses fell before us, transforming back into the human dream-guise of my decade of trauma, crashing to their knees, scrambling away, struck by awe at the sight of my truth, my squid-skull mask, my claim upon Horror. Many of them were still caught in the act of turning around, still shambling toward the doomed last stand at the end of the corridor. Zalu and Xiyu swept in behind us, shouting stereotypical things like 'On the floor! Face down! Hands on the back of your head!', 'Stay down, stay down!' Privately I thought that was a bit unnecessary, but I let them deal with the few nurses who had not fallen to their knees or collapsed onto their backsides.

The waters of my trauma parted before us, rolling back like the tide defeated.

Even without my six tentacles and my other selves and the glorious truth of my true body, I had never before felt so much like an angel.

Within the space of a few moments, there were simply no more zombie nurses before us — only the equally bewildered, awestruck faces of a dozen Cygnet patients, crammed against the end of the corridor, with nowhere left to run.

We had saved their last stand.

Twelve patients of all shapes and sizes stood shoulder to shoulder, protecting a cluster of younger girls huddled behind the line. They clutched improvised weapons, broken table legs, and the shattered remnants of their own barricade. Many of them were bleeding from small cuts and grazes, just as I had seen on the monitors. One tall girl with frizzy dark hair stared out from behind a mask of blood, running from a shallow head wound — but she stood defiant, in the centre, the closest thing to a leader. Two of the girls had been dragged down by the nurses, but were quickly helped up by their companions. One could barely stand, and had apparently been injected with something nasty. The other had a broken rib, coughing and cringing and leaning on her friends. The smaller girls behind the line peeked out between the arms and legs of their protectors, awestruck at the sight of me and Eileen, at the dark eye holes of my squid-skull mask, and at Horror's severed head.

For a strange moment I had no idea what to say; I almost apologised, but the whisper was lost behind my mask. These patients, these teenage girls and young women given form and figure by the dream, they were more than mere metaphor. The nurses I had conquered were my own trauma, pressed into human form. But these patients, they were everything and everyone ever drawn into the event horizon of the Eye, of that I was certain now. Their true bodies and minds were Outsiders from beyond the rim of my imagination. Eileen had trapped them without intention, and I had pulled them into this dream.

The patients' collective shock passed quickly. Eyes alighted upon Eileen, going wide with surprise and alarm. Weapons were brandished, fists raised, lips pulled back from snarling teeth. Flagging protectors regained their unsteady feet. The shield wall tried to reform. Shouts went up.

"It's her!"

"The fucking Governor!"

"She's come to finish the job—"

"Don't be stupid, Emily, she knocked all the nurses out! Look at them all!"

"She's come to unscrew our heads and scoop out our brains!"

"Weapons up, girls! Sadie, back behind. One of you girls get another brick, ready to—"

"I could run her through from here!"

“Give it a shot!”

“It’s her! It’s the Governor, it’s—”

Eileen said: “I’m sorry, but I seem to have misplaced that identity.”

The wall of girls hesitated all at once, as if they’d never heard the Governor speak before.

I raised Horror’s head, so that my intention could not be mistaken. “She’s not the Governor anymore!”

A flinch ran through the line of patients. All eyes jumped to my squid-skull mask. One of the younger girls behind the line yelped in sudden child-like fear, clutching at a friend to her side. A couple of the boldest patients up front raised their makeshift weapons, angled toward me like spears, as if I was a monster about to fall upon them.

Did I really sound so terrifying, from inside my squid-skull mask?

“She’s not the Governor anymore!” I repeated. “She’s my mother!”

The patients exchanged a series of worried glances, as if I was a madwoman bellowing nonsense. The tall girl with the frizzy hair and the blood all down her face squinted up at me.

Praem poked her plush head out from inside my yellow blanket, and suggested that though my struggles determined the nature and shape of the dream, to these patients such concerns were incomprehensibly peripheral.

“Incomprehensibly peripheral?” I whispered inside my helmet, and refrained from commenting on Praem’s choice of language. “Then what—”

Act like a revolutionary, Praem suggested. Tell them the truth.

“I’m with Lozzie!” I shouted — and that seemed to do the trick. Weapons dipped, fists uncurled, eyebrows raised in surprise. Lozzie was the most popular girl in all the worlds Outside, of course, and that had carried over into the dream of Cygnet. “And so is the Governor! She’s given up all her authority, she knows we’re in the right! The Governor is no more, and soon enough Cygnet Asylum will be no more! You all saw what I just did, yes? You must all know that this is a nightmare, a false reality. Cygnet Asylum is a lie and a trick, and we don’t have to endure it any longer. You all have real faces, real bodies, outside this dream. We're going to tear down these walls and free every last prisoner! We're going to crack open the Box, and the staff can't stop us anymore!"

The line of girls visibly relaxed at the flow of my words. Some of them looked at each other and laughed or sagged with relief. Others finally lowered their weapons, stunned into silence, then nodding at my crescendo. The tall one with the head wound thought for a moment — then snapped off a salute at me. A ragged cheer went up as I finished.

My chest swelled with a strange pride, a feeling I had never experienced before. Was I leading these girls? Was I the right person to deliver this rousing speech? Behind my mask I was just Heather, and I had caused this dream in the first place, I bore the guilt—

Crack-crrrack went the glass in the deeps. None of the patients reacted.

One of the smaller girls pressed a round little face between the legs of her protectors, and addressed me. "What about the robot soldiers we saw downstairs? They were shooting at the nurses, but then they chased us!"

I looked down at her. So like myself when I was her age, questioning and inquisitive, before all that had been crushed by Cygnet.

"They won't shoot at me," I said, "They'll follow my orders if I can reach them. As long as you all stay behind me, we can win."

The tall girl with the blood on her face pointed past me and Eileen. "What about all those fuckers in the meantime, huh? You gonna tie them all up, squid-girl? Way too many to take prisoner."

"No," I said, and smiled inside my mask. "I have a better use for them. Eileen, turn us around, if you please."

"The lady turns, and is for turning," Eileen whispered, just loud enough so only I could hear.

Behind us, the corridor was littered with the six dozen nurses we had parted and conquered, down on their knees or lying on their faces, collapsed through sheer awe, staring up at me and Eileen — or at the hungry mouths of the Twins' guns. A few of them kept trying to get to their feet, thrown down again and again by Zalu and Xiyu. Many of them looked terrified, for their weapons and tools had disintegrated in their hands, while the remaining lengths of rope and pairs of cuff seemed to slither out of their grip when they tried to reassert control.

But these were no blank-faced automatons or zombie-like metaphors. The expression of my trauma suddenly looked like a corridor full of terrified women, with human faces and human reactions. This was the line which would divide me from my Other Self.

I raised Horror's head again, and raised my voice.

"All of you, listen to me!"

Every nurse looked up, even the ones who weren't going quietly. A lump formed in my throat — I was no great orator, not exactly skilled at public speaking, but I had no choice except to make this work. What would Sevens say? She would probably let the logic of the scene flow through her. I imagined myself in her place, confident and powerful and with a God's command of dream-logic. I let the mask speak for me.

"I take responsibility," I said. "I take responsibility for you, every single one of you, and everything you've done here, in this dream, upon this stage. I accept you, all of you, all the different aspects and facets of my trauma. You hear me? I accept you! You will not be cast out into the cold when this process ends. You will not be abandoned, if you fail to assert dominance and control. You will not be forgotten, if you do not command. You are not in charge! But you will not be exiled. None of you will be forgotten. I promise." I waited a beat, as if underlining my intention. "Now, all of you, stand up, leave the employ of the hospital, and join us in revolution. Help us pull down these walls. Help us make something new."

Silence.

The nurses shared looks far more sceptical and worried than the patients had done. If anything, the crowd seemed even more terrified than before.

Sweat beaded on my face. Had I gotten this all wrong? Had we not bent and broken the genre far enough for this to work? Were these women — who had moments ago been shambling monsters — convinced they were still nurses?

What mad step must I take, to have my own trauma accept what it was?

Horror's severed head opened her mouth with a wet and bloody click, issued a rather unimpressed little sigh, and said: "She didn't leave me behind, though she really should have done, strictly speaking. Come along, ladies. I think we know when we're beaten."

The carpet of defeated nurses all stared up at Horror, but stayed frozen where they lay.

I hissed inside my mask. "Try harder."

"I did!" Horror muttered from the corner of her mouth. "Heather, you're the one in charge now! I'm just providing a little credibility. If you can't convince ... ah."

Slowly, with great caution, a single nurse rose to her feet.

She was young — perhaps no more than a handful of years older than me, with long mousy hair and big bright eyes and a face gone white with terror. The name tag pinned to the chest of her uniform read 'A.TOKEN'. She raised her hands in surrender as she stood up, shooting fearful looks at Zalu and Xiyu. I gestured for the Twins to let her rise, though they stood ready to knock her back to the floor if she did anything untoward. They needn't have bothered though — 'Token' could barely make her legs work, so overawed by defeat and transformation. Her knees shook as she drew herself up to her full height.

When Token was certain she wasn't about to be brutalised by the buttstock of a submachine gun, she looked up into the eye holes of my mask. Her lips moved, but her voice was nary a whisper.

"Speak up," I called out.

Token flinched, then took a deep breath. "I accept," she said. "I accept. I accept! And I'm ... I'm sorry."

"Then show me," I replied.

For a moment Token didn't know what to do — and in truth, neither did I. The logic of the dream had made a demand through my lips. It simply seemed right to ask for an outward sign of fealty and submission, some physical proof that this manifestation of trauma had finally given up the pantomime of primacy.

Token hesitated, eyes darting left and right, throat bobbing with panic. But then her face lit up with sudden realisation.

She grabbed the Cygnet-issue name tag on her chest — A.TOKEN — and ripped it clean off, leaving behind a ragged gash in the starched white of her uniform. She flung the name tag onto the floor, raised one sensible shoe, and stamped on the offending label. The plastic cracked beneath her heel, blotting out her name, her job title, and the stylised words, ‘Cygnet Hospital Staff’.

Token — or whatever she was now — looked up into the eye sockets of my mask.

For a horrible moment I had no idea how to respond. This was no trickery or trap. The symbolism and power of the dream was responding to my will. This little token of my trauma had truly surrendered, in the one way that really mattered. But the words were jammed in my throat. I almost hiccuped in panic, blocked only by the power of my squid-skull mask.

Praem peered up from inside my yellow blanket and provided the obvious answer.

Even then the words still stuck fast. I didn’t want to say them. A decade of resentment was almost too much.

But I had to let go. All other roads led to self-defeat.

Praem was right. I said the words.

“You are forgiven,” I told the nurse.

Those three words opened the floodgates; like a ripple from a pebble cast into deep water, the nurses rose to their feet either side of Token, then all the way back down the corridor. Name tags were ripped from uniforms and cast to the floor in a clatter of plastic rain. Almost six dozen heels came down on six dozen designations — A.LIE cracked and A.TECHNICALITY broke in two; A.FIST was kicked to the wall and A.BOOT was destroyed beneath the heel of a shoe; A.BURDEN was abandoned and A.DUTY was rejected. In the space of a few seconds, almost six dozen nurses had given up their places in the hierarchy of suffering that was Cygnet Asylum.

Yet not all the nurses accepted my forgiveness. A couple stood defiant, arms crossed over their chests, frowning in disapproval — A.BAD MEMORY and A.LONELY NIGHT. A bold nurse, tall and strong — A.REFUSAL — made a lunge for Zalu's gun, only to get knocked across the jaw and shoved back to the floor. A handful of others hesitated too long, then hardened their faces, scowling at me from over their name tags — A.GRUDGE and A.RANCOR, A.RELAPSE and A.ROLE.

I swallowed a sigh. Not all trauma was so easily accepted. This process would last the entire rest of my life, but at least it had begun.

“Ma’am!” Xiyu shouted, covering some of those last few with the muzzle of her gun. “What do we do with the recidivists?!”

Horror whispered, “Interesting word.”

“You keep your mouth shut,” I said to her.

“Y-yes, Heather.”

I raised my voice. “They are still my responsibility, still mine to accept, even if they reject it for now. But we don’t have time to process them at the moment. Tie them up and bring them with us. I’ll deal with them later.”

Xiyu nodded, then gestured with her gun. Zalu moved to grab one of the rough blue nylon ropes which had fallen to the floor. The recidivists and reactionaries began to raise fists and back toward each other, forming a rough circle of their own last stand. I hissed with frustration behind my mask — were they really going to make us fight? Make us shoot them? They were my trauma, and they would not be swept away so easily, but I would not goaded into shooting them or abandoning them, or something equally worse. The dream logic would not serve me well if I took such extreme measures.

Before I could shout a halt, the ex-nurses — the ones who had cast off their badges and their roles — surged forward to apprehend their former co-workers.

Liberated hands grabbed rope and twisted unruly wrists behind backs. Superior numbers blocked clumsy punches and piled on top of the holdouts. In the space of half a minute, the former nurses had the handful of refusers bound at wrist and waist, roped together, ready to bring along with us.

One of the patients behind me let out a low whistle. “You’ve really got them whipped. Holy shit. Alright, squid-face girl, I’m on your side. What now?”

I glanced back to find the tall girl with the dried blood on her face looking up at me, broken table leg held ready in one fist, a determined light in her eyes.

“Now?” I echoed, and felt a grin rising behind my mask. “Now we break the asylum, and rescue the patients, and find all our lost friends.”

The tall girl cracked a grin. “Fuck yeah, squid-face. You leading us, then?”

I raised Horror’s head like a trophy and battle standard both in one. I filled my lungs to bursting, despite the throb of tender flesh in my guts. I yelled as loud as I could, putting all my confidence into a cry.

“Everyone who wants to be free, follow me!”

A cheer went up, both in front and behind, from patients and ex-nurses alike. Eileen took the cue and strode forward, down the double-line of former nurses to either side. Zalu and Xiyu fell in just ahead, our vanguard on the path. The scrum of patients swept up behind me, a phalanx to our rear, their younger numbers sheltered in the middle. Then the great mass of six dozen nurses swung in to follow.

We left the dead-end corridor behind, rampaging out into the ruptured guts of Cygnet Hospital.

Over the following hour — or two, or three, or ten, for time ceased to have meaning at the centre of revolution’s vortex — that minor triumph played out again and again and again. We burst through double-doors with the aid of the Twins’ booted feet, surprising gaggles of nurses leaning over girls strapped to operating tables, scattering the surgical torture before it could begin. We rescued beleaguered last stands in besieged doctor’s offices, extending a hand to patients who had thought themselves overwhelmed. We stumbled upon running battles inside a pool room — the pool itself long drained of water — and another in the movie theatre where I had met Lizzie, the screen now torn, the lights on full, the stage a shield wall of patients. We turned those tides and added their numbers to our own. We watched nurses tear their uniforms and cast off their false names, and bloodied patients flock to us by the dozen.

The process had a logic all of its own; I had set something in motion greater than myself. I could not have stopped it even if I had wanted, for I was not standing at the head of an army and giving orders — I barely spoke except to deliver forgiveness to my traumas and promises of liberation to the patients and inmates. If I had fallen unconscious upon Eileen's back, the crowd would have simply swept us onward, using my insensible body to banish the nurse-zombies in every fresh corridor and hallway and stinking chamber of Cygnet Asylum.

We did very little actual fighting — we had no need, not with the way that my mere touch was enough to disable the nurses and return them to their human forms. Zalu and Xiyu were not forced to use their guns, much to my incredible relief; their duties were limited mostly to controlling the few nurses in every conquered group who refused to submit. The great crowd of nurses gathering to my rear were no use in a fight — none of them seemingly thought to pick up weapons or lend their strength, perhaps because they had given up on that role. The patients, far fewer in number, stayed closer to the figure I presented, riding on Eileen's back; on several occasions they did fight, the same as they had done so without my leadership, holding back the monstrous metaphor of the zombie-nurses for the few moments it took Eileen to carry me forward.

We swept through the hospital like an avalanche down a mountainside, gathering and growing, crushing everything before us, almost without contest.

I lost track of the edges of the group as we grew; such a feat was impossible for one mind, let alone one still wracked with pain behind my mask. Those closer to the front and core of the group made themselves into my lieutenants, those few patients who had been leading their respective groups before I had shown up. They shouted orders back and forth, herded the less confident and younger girls, darted forward to peek around corners, and called out warnings as we spotted fresh nurses up ahead. At some point we picked up three Knights — battered and scuffed, their weapons reduced to expensive clubs, their mirrored visors cracked by nurse-fists, their impaled-tentacle insignias long discarded; those three joined Zalu and Xiyu in the vanguard, taking orders from the Twins with wordless precision, their true natures once again well-recalled.

Events blurred together — one liberation became another and another and another, smeared into one long streak by my exhaustion and pain. But I couldn't call a halt, not yet. We had to find the others, find my friends, find my other six selves, overcome myself, and end this nightmare so Maisie could finally be free. We had to peel my Lonely Counterpart out of her shell, and throw the Box wide open.

Now and again I heard that deep-down cracking sound, that crickle-crackle of straining glass, somewhere far beneath all our feet.

The Box was breaking already.

Eventually, a bright, clear, clean moment finally punctuated the rolling wave of the revolution — Zalu and Xiyu led the way out through a pair of double doors, and suddenly we found ourselves beneath the open sky, in the middle of a courtyard between several hospital buildings. Sad, wilted, bedraggled flowers grew in beds around the rim, while rotten old benches offered dubious places to sit, perched on crumbly concrete amid pathways of sad and faded asphalt. Dark windows stared down at us from all sides, some flickering with the hint of patients and nurses still locked in the long nightmare.

We swept through that open courtyard without pause, plunging toward the exit on the opposite side.

But for just a second, cool dawn breeze reached beneath my squid-skull mask and buoyed me up, waking me from the process of which I had become but one small part. I raised my eye sockets to the sky, to her, to the Eye.

Clean silver light poured from the narrow slit which stretched from horizon to horizon, a sliver of the vast shimmering sea beneath her gnarled black outer layers. Lid-ridges the size of mountain ranges bunched and wrinkled either side of that gaze, holding back the lid-halves wider than continents. The silver light eased through the eye sockets of my mask, and touched the skin of my face. It was warm.

"I see you now," I whispered. "Hello up there."

"My eyes are down here," said Eileen, beneath me.

I almost laughed, swept up in the heady tonic of the revolution all around us. “And you’re very beautiful, up there in the sky. You always were, I just couldn’t stop to look at you before, not for more than a split-second.”

“And now we have a staring contest.”

“Don’t be silly,” I murmured. “I’ve already won that.”

The crowd of patients and nurses, led by the Twins and a trio of Knights, swept us across the courtyard to the matching double-doors on the other side. As I lowered my gaze from the Eye, preparing to once again plunge into the hospital corridors, I caught a glimpse of a familiar velvet-black back over the rooftops, furred with whorls of white, framed by the flutter-buzz of giant wings, heralded by a distant prrrrrrrt-brrrrrrt! of lepidoptoid lungs.

Tenny was still fighting her own mock battle, doing her best to reach the Box.

“We’ll be there soon, Tenny,” I whispered. “Be there soon.”

“Presently,” said Eileen — and that time I could not comprehend the pun.

Zalu and Xiyu burst through the double doors and back into the hospital, followed by the Knights, then by myself and Eileen. The patients streamed in after us, carrying us forward like a tide, followed in turn by the great number of liberated ex-nurses. We plunged down the length of a wide, whitewashed corridor, the walls plastered with art by inmates and patients, punctuated by notices and circulars on pinboards and whiteboards, and by doors which opened upon big, bare rooms — classrooms or exercise rooms, in a part of the hospital I had never seen before.

The corridor disgorged us into a wide waiting room, with sticky floors and plastic chairs, lit by buzzing fluorescent lights and wallpapered with saccharine scenes from children’s books, of happy-faced dogs fetching bones and serene cows grazing in cartoon pastures. This was the kind of place which was unmoored from time and reality even when not in a dream, the sort of place I hated from the bottom of my heart.

To our collective left stood a row of doors leading deeper into the hospital; to our right was a wooden reception counter like a barricade across the room, abandoned now, the depths behind sunk in shadow, the bulbs all burst or ripped from their sockets.

And directly ahead of us were two dozen nurses and patients, mingled together, their distinctions irrelevant now, down on their knees with their hands in the air or clasping the backs of their heads, pleading for their lives with a force that could not listen.

Six Empty Guards — the robotic automations serving the foolish paranoia of my Lonely Counterpart, formed like smaller, neater, more regimented versions of my beloved Knights, with shiny visors and black body armour and the herky-jerky movements of a stop-motion animation — had six beetle-black guns aimed into the pleading crowd.

As we burst into the room and swept forward, the Empty Guards twitched their attention away from those they held at gunpoint. I shouted to stop — slow down, halt, they’ve got guns! — but the logic of the mob was independent of my will, and they hit the brakes far too late. Zalu and Xiyu slammed to a halt, guns raised, fingers on triggers; the trio of Knights did the same, but they were only bluffing, their guns were not for shooting anymore. The patients scrambled to end their forward flow, heels skidding on the sticky floor, shouts of alarm passing back down the line.

Six muzzles swung upward to bite great chunks out of the revolution.

“Hold your fire!” I screamed inside my mask, hoping that my voice — the same voice as their Lonely, Bitter, Nasty Little Leader — would stall their guns. Eileen shouldered me to the front of the crowd in three quick steps, bursting from between the patients to block the Guard’s shots. “I order you to hold your fire! No shooting! No shooting! Put your guns down, put your—”

All six muzzles pointed right at my face.

Six jerky fingers tightened on six feathery triggers. Zalu and Xiyu did the same, preparing to open fire. Three Knights strode forward to take what bullets they could — but they wouldn’t be enough, they could not shield us all. Eileen and I would be in the fore, but the bullets would tear into the crowd behind us.

I had believed, somewhere deep down inside, that the Other Me, the Lonely and Bitter Me, the Me with the Most Terrible of Plans, would never stoop to this. She accused me of wishing her dead, of wanting her imprisoned or erased. But that was all projection, for now her soldiers pointed their guns at me and mine.

By extending myself the smallest grain of faith, I had lost.

Another great, deep, distant cracking sound of meter-thick glass echoed up from miles beneath my feet.

Guilt and rage surged upward from my chest. I bared my teeth and held Horror's head aloft in that final split-second. She would have me shot — but she would still lose. Whatever she was trying to keep contained, it was only a matter of time until it broke free. Maisie would be free, even if I fell here.

I felt the six bullets slide into the six chambers. I stared into the six muzzles, so big and dark and empty. I saw my own face — my squid-skull mask — reflected in six blank and empty visors, six eye holes times six, smeared out across the dream.

But still I had to try, for all those who had followed me.

“Don't sho—”

A knife-blade of flesh and claw and iridescent membrane vaulted from the shadows behind the reception desk.

It moved faster than my poor eyes could follow, a whirling flicker-flash of abyssal grace crossing the room as a blur of rainbow-strobing colour. Spikes and spines and a fist of razor-sharp talons took the first Empty Guard off at the head. A sinuous tentacle caught the head before it could fall, and used it to crack the skull of the next Guard in line. Guns were turning toward the apparition, muzzles trying to flicker around and draw a bead — but she slapped the weapons with another tentacle, dripping acid to corrode their mechanisms, clogging their barrels with rainbow mucus, burning the hands of their wielders.

The four remaining Empty Guards stumbled backward, trying to get range, to regroup, to retreat. But it — her, she, the sight taking my breath away — unfurled wings like oceanic membranes, snapping taut in the air and pouncing after her prey. Webbed fingers grabbed a faceplate and put a spike through a robotic brain. Two tentacles ripped a gun from robotic hands and smashed the butt through a neck. A floating membrane caught the second to last Guard and melted it at the joints, leaving it to fall like prey drained of fluids. The last Empty Guard threw down the gun and lashed out with a fist. She took the punch full in the face, unhinged her jaw, and bit off the entire hand at the wrist.

The Guard stumbled back, wrist-stump spewing oil. She spat out the hand, then rammed a tentacle full of spikes through the Guard's neck. The final robot body dropped with a clatter.

Truth and beauty paused for a moment, caught in bioluminescent profile against the shadows. The crowd all around me shifted, as if afraid.

"No!" I hissed. "No. She's with me. She's ... she's me."

Homo abyssus — one of six, for all six were free and loose in the hospital now — straightened up and turned toward me.

She — I? Me? — was one of the most breathtakingly beautiful things I had ever seen.

Sleek, smooth, and sharp. Skin like peach and dove feathers and the dark of the void, all at the same time. Muscles like warm butter, toned and slender, rolled beneath naked skin, scaled and furred and spined. She was built for speed and grace and perfection of motion. Her mouth was full of razor-sharp teeth. Her eyes flickered from one colour to the next like staring into a nebula of the mind. Her hair floated like tendrils in undersea currents. Six tentacles quivered with polymorphous change, folding away spikes and barbs and acid-dripping toxic stingers. Great membranous wings settled back over her shoulders. Her hands were webbed, her feet were clawed, and she had two sets of knees, one facing backward like an animal. A narrow, barbed tail lashed from her rear. She was perfect.

She had my face, transformed by euphoria.

She smiled at me, opened her mouth, and went hiiiiiiisssss.

Tears ran down my cheeks. A great need burned in my chest, one which I had been suppressing and ignoring and putting off since the beginning of this nightmare, this parody of Cygnet Asylum. That was me! That was my body! That was us!

I reached out a hand from Eileen's back, lips quivering behind my mask.

"Come— come here!" I said. "Please, let's be one again, let's—"

She — a part of my own mind, a piece of myself — stepped back and shook her head.

“ ... w-what?” I murmured, surely too soft to be heard beyond my mask. “Why? Why? You’re me, I’m you! We’re finally back together, we ... we ... ”

Heather abyssus opened her mouth and spoke through a wall of shark-like teeth.

“You don’t pass the sniff test,” she said in a hissing, gurgling, otherworldly voice from the very bottom of the abyss, with a throat not designed for human words. “Neither did the other.”

“ ... what? What are you— the other? The other me? What do you mean?”

“You need to put yourself back together, Heather,” said Abyssal and Beautiful Me. “Or we won’t have any foundation on which to cling.”

She took another step back, as if to turn away and slip into the shadows.

“Wait!” I almost screamed. “Please, please, wait— hic— wait! Where are you going?!”

Abyssal Truth raised eyebrows of feather-soft down. “To rescue our family — Raine, Evee, all the others. Aren’t you with us, Heather?”

I nodded, despite the aching need in my chest. “Always, always! But can’t we just recombine first, can’t we—”

“Then I’ll lead the way. We’ll put you back together yet. Keep up, Heather!”

bedlam boundary – 24.33

Heather abyssus — me, just me, me all along, my figure and form and face wrapped in pneuma-somatic truth, flowing with sharp and sinuous grace, stalking ahead with a rapid click-a-click-clack of cleanly curved claws against the cold hospital floor, with barbed tail swishing and snapping from the base of a naked spine lined with velvet fur and armoured scales, with membranous wings flickering about her shoulders and flanks like the razor's edge of heat-haze in a void.

She plunged back into the labyrinth of Cygnet Asylum.

What else could I do but follow? I had been chasing that euphoria half my life.

Our progress through the buckling, broken, breached-and-beaten guts of the hospital became a burning blur — but not like before, not consumed by the heady rush of cumulative victories. Outwardly nothing had changed except the Abyssal scout and vanguard pulling us onward. I still rode at the head of what had become a conquering army, gathering mass and numbers and power, flowing down the corridors of the hospital like clean blood washing away decades of infected flesh. That 'army' was still present at my back, dozens of patients led by my temporary lieutenants, with the great crowd of liberated ex-nurses following behind. The Twins — Zalu and Xiyu, dressed like video game soldiers, with white hair bobbing in mismatched ponytails — still hurried along either side of me, backed up by the trio of Knights we had rescued. Praem was still tucked into my yellow blanket, anchoring me to Eileen's back with all the strength a plushie could muster. Eileen herself still held my body aloft, a rock-solid foundation for a piggyback. I still wore my squid-skull mask upon my face, and held Horror's severed head in one hand, proclaiming that the war within myself was all but over. We still cut through the monstrous zombie-nurses like morning sunlight melting nightmare's mist and fog.

My 'army' howled down the hospital corridors, hot on the heels of my Abyssal Self. She led us deeper and deeper through whitewashed hallways, across the debris of ransacked meeting rooms, and through the shattered walls of ruined operating theatres. We were still a rising note of victory, still a crescendo roaring toward climax.

But that climax never came. All I could do was pant and whine behind my mask.

All those others at my rear, all those details of our careening trajectory through the hospital, all of it faded away in my peripheral vision. The cries and shouts of my little army were drowned out by my own quivering breath and the rapid flutter of my heart. Tears of desire and denial ran down my cheeks and gathered on my lips, tasting of salt and copper. I whispered, voice shaking, "Please ... please ... "

I had eyes only for her — for myself, I, me, everything I should be — true and beautiful at last.

The mere sight of Heather abyssus stalking and striding and slinking ahead of us drew me from my body like a squid pulled from between a crack in the rocks, my flesh hooked by her venomous spines, pierced by her poison spikes, wrapped tight and squeezed within her tentacles, dragged from my hiding place on a rip-tide current of need and lust.

And I'm not being abstract about the lust.

I had never understood what Raine saw in me, physically and sexually; I trusted that she saw something, of course. I knew she wasn't faking her appreciation when she told me how attractive she found me, or when she expressed that desire, regularly and often, by pushing me up against a wall and making me squeal into her shoulder with three of her fingers up inside me. Raine wasn't lying — but I simply couldn't see through her eyes, could not see myself with the gaze of another. Whenever I examined myself in the mirror, even scrubbed and clean and glowing with happiness, presented in my most confident moments, I struggled to see anything sexually attractive about my small breasts and slender hips and stumpy legs and scrawny five-foot-nothing body, wrapped in pallid, pasty skin, topped by a plain little face and a head of colourless brown hair. That was the Heather I saw when I looked in the mirror — an ordinary girl, with nothing special to recommend me to anybody. But that was also the Heather I had seen on the wall of monitors — Lonely Heather, ugly, small, and stunted, with exactly the same face as my own.

The only beauty I had begun to find in my own body was in those six tentacles, in their smooth and buttery pneuma-somatic muscle, in their bioluminescence, in how they gestured toward a truth of what I should have been all along. Those six tentacles I had made over the last year of trial and error and tribulation were by far my best feature.

But her — as she stalked ahead of us down the corridors of Cygnet Asylum? Heather Abyssal, Heather Ascendant, Heather Angelic, with her eyes like the inside of dying suns, with her undulating skin and scales and softly ruffled fur the thousand colours of boiling midnight skies?

I wanted her, and I wanted to be her, in a way I had never felt before. All my desire for Raine or Zheng or Eevee or Sevens was but a mere shadow of this incandescent lust.

If I had met this dream-separated tentacle-self under almost any other conditions, nothing could have held me back, nothing except rejection. If this Heather Abyssal decided to turn around right in the middle of Cygnet and pounce on me, I would not have resisted. If she wanted to drag me from Eileen's back and impale me on spikes and spines and pull at my flesh with her claws and open me up and climb inside my hot and quivering meat, I would have cried tears of squealing delight. I wanted her to pin me to the wall as Raine did, or slam me against the floor and bite into my neck. I wanted to run my hands over that body — my body! — and drink in the divine truth of scales and fur, cup the bases of claws and spikes, run my shaking fingers over her hips and flanks, kiss the flowing muscle of her tentacles. Kiss myself! Kiss my own beauty, for it was an impossible gift from the abyss.

But she had said no.

She had declined reunion. She had told me I smelled wrong, that I was a poor foundation, incomplete, and not myself. Euphoria was within reach, but I had been found wanting.

So Eileen carried me forward, while I wept and shook behind my squid-skull mask.

Luckily for me — not to mention for my friends, and for Maisie — this one of six, this tentacle-Heather, she possessed a far clearer head than I could keep.

She broke the trance of my forlorn lust upon an unexpected rock, right in the middle of our stream.

Down a particularly dirty, dingy, stain-encrusted Cygnet hallway, lined with rusty bars which blocked off shadow-choked entrances to the prison-level, we slammed right into a thick knot of nurses. Abyssal Heather leapt into them from behind like a threshing machine, clawed fists and barbed tentacles hurling them aside to cut a path, leaving awful lacerated wounds across their sagging grey faces, tearing open their already ragged uniforms. Luckily for the soon-to-be-ex-nurses, Eileen stuck close to Abyssal Heather's heels; the faintest brush of my skin or a glance from my squid-skull mask was enough to transform a nurse-monster back into a human form, unwounded and whole, blinking and sweating, cowering in awe and terror as Abyssal and Other passed by.

Just like every previous encounter with unredeemed nurses and additional patients, we swept through the crowd as if they were butter before a blowtorch. My patients and liberated ex-nurses hurried up through the breach behind me, spreading the good word among those who lay defeated, rushing forward to rescue those who had been besieged.

But the patients we saved here were subtly different to all those we had previously encountered. These girls were not dressed in Cygnet-issue pajamas, but clad in rags and filthy grey jumpsuits and the remnants of torn-open straitjackets. They were armed not with broken table legs and makeshift shields, but with shivs and dirty little knives and lengths of jagged iron pipe. Some of them looked half-starved, nourished by nothing but the rage of the wrongly confined and blossoming faith in the revolution; others were oddly pale or ghoulish, as if they had not seen sunlight in years, blinking and shying from the thin grey dawn-light filtering in from outdoors. All of them were far filthier, much bloodier, and roaring with triumph as we reached them.

Several of the patients from my 'army' rushed forward to embrace old friends or lost comrades. Half a dozen battered Knights strode from the mass of newcomers and clasped hands with the trio we had already gathered.

Abyssal Heather turned to face me, paused in the middle of the crowd, framed by a coiling mass of umbra and shadow.

“Heatherrrrr,” purred Perfect and Flawless Me. She drew my name out, turning the final letter into a high-pitched clicking noise.

“Here, here. Pay attention.”

Pay attention? But I was already staring at her, my heart racing, my breath ragged with desire. “Uhhhn?” I managed to grunt.

Abyssal Me cracked a grin. My heart soared — for there I was, my own expressions wrought in abyssal muscle and scale and fur; she was a little embarrassed, almost sheepish, as if trying not to acknowledge something right in front of her face. Was that how I looked when overcome by the same emotions?

No, of course not. I could not look that beautiful, not without reunion.

She hissed gently, then said in that gurgling, inhuman voice: “You’re in heat. It’s very flattering, but this isn’t the time.”

My lips parted. I could barely breathe. “I ... but I ... can’t we reunite and—”

Then I realised — these were not, strictly speaking, patients we had rescued; these were the inmates released from the prison levels beneath the relatively presentable hospital exterior. These were the girls like Raine, freed by one of my own.

The trance of lust lifted from my eyes. I blinked rapidly behind the sockets of my mask, and realised what shape loomed behind my Abyssal Self.

“Night Praem?” I croaked.

Night Praem stood at the centre of the liberated inmates — a mass of roiling shadow like infinite layers of lace and gossamer floating in an oil-dark sea, a cloud of ink spreading wide beneath the ocean waves, frilled at the edges like delicate folds of mollusc flesh the colour of sable and ebony. Her presence seemed to drink the meagre light in the corridor, tinting the walls and rusty bars to either side with shadows from nowhere, floating in mid-air like a cephalopod bobbing in a column of water. In the very centre of the vortex-mass of living night, the heavy curves of a feminine outline faced toward me, long tendrils of hair hanging over her shoulders in ragged rat-tails, blank and black eyes lost behind waves of charcoal fog.

The inmates and patients gave Night Praem plenty of space, but they were clearly unafraid of her. She had led them out of the dark of the prison, after all.

Abyssal Heather cocked her head and shot me a sceptical look. “Did you forget already, Heatherrrr? I told you, we’re rescuing our family. Stop thinking with your cunt.”

“O-of course I didn’t forget about Praem!” I blurted out. “I just got ... distracted, by ... w-well, yes.” I huffed. “You can’t blame me ... I can’t ... I can’t go on much longer without ... without you ... ”

“Mmmmmmm,” purred Abyssal Heather; that sound was enough to send a shiver through the exact organ she had so indelicately named.

Night Praem floated forward, moving straight through Abyssal Heather like a ghost from a cheap horror movie, as if cutting short our bizarre masturbatory flirting. Abyssal Heather blinked several times as Night Praem passed through her body, then sneezed, an alien sound which drew a ring of flinches from the nearby patients and inmates. Zalu and Xiyu didn’t raise their guns, but they did step back, silently wary of this umbral apparition.

Horror murmured, “Gosh, she’s fab.”

“You be quiet,” I muttered back. “And ‘fab’?”

“Short for fabulous,” Horror whispered. “You should expand your vocabulary sometime.”

“Shut up.”

Night Praem stopped about six feet from Eileen. From below me, Eileen said: “How very occult.”

“Is ... is that another pun?” I asked.

“I think so,” said Eileen. “Now, how are we to shed light on this veil?”

The answer came from the Praem Plushie, tucked into the front of my yellow blanket.

Present me, said Praem.

Not one to question the wisdom of plushies, especially when in dreams, I let go of Eileen with my left hand and extracted the Praem Plushie from within my yellow blanket. I held her out over Eileen's shoulder, but Night Praem made no movement. She neither raised a hand inside her cloud of inky darkness, nor stepped forward to retrieve the missing half of her soul.

"Praem?" I croaked. "Praem, what's wrong?"

Perfect and Spiky Heather stalked forward, claws clicking against the floor, throat clicking slow and soft when she opened her mouth. "She's nervous. Doesn't want to face everything this experience has taught her about herself. A little like you, Heatherrrr."

"What does that mean?" I demanded.

Smooth and Jagged Me cocked her head, as if I should know exactly what she was talking about.

"W-well," I said, desperate to fill the fertile silence. "I can hardly blame her for that, this dream has been intense for all of us, to put it lightly. But we don't have time for this right now, we need to get to the Box, to Maisie. Praem? Praem, you have to—"

Throw me, demanded the Praem Plushie.

"Throw you?!" I said. "Praem, I would never—"

A maid is still a maid, even when in descent, said the Praem Plushie.

With no way in which to formulate a credible counterargument — for I knew so little about maids — I did as she requested. With what little strength remained in my left arm, I tossed the stout and huggable little plushie directly at Night Praem's face. As the plushie breached the shadow, Night Praem flinched backward. As the plushie made contact with her core, Night Praem lashed out with one shadow-draped arm and caught herself in a gentle grip.

Umbra and shadow collapsed like a sheet of oil caught by gravity's sudden pull, splashing to the floor and vanishing into the folds of the dream; gloom and fog sucked inward, condensing into lace and frill, peeling back from pale skin and a loose bun of bright blonde hair, revealing a pair of blank white eyes set in a round, pleasant, soft-cheeked face. Undulating shade collapsed into the fabric of a long pleated skirt, the shiny black of heavily booted feet, and the form-fitting ruffles of a well-tailored, very familiar, and most excellent maid uniform.

Praem — my Praem, looking almost exactly as she did out in reality, with only the addition of a dozen or so extra layers of excessive lace — held the plushie in both hands, staring into the blank fabric eyes of her own little Plush Self.

“Praem!” I cried with relief. Our demon-maid doll-daughter was wide awake at last. “Praem, oh it’s so good to see you. I mean, in full, back to normal. Though ... why are you the only one of us who looks exactly like you do outside of the dream?”

Praem looked up and into my eyes. Her blank white orbs were so beautifully unreadable, I could have hugged her if I was down on my own two feet.

“Okay, well,” I said, giving up some ground. “Not exactly like in reality, I suppose. That is a very fancy lace setup at your throat. And ... white lace gloves?” Praem raised a hand as I noticed that little detail; from fingertips to elbows both her arms were wrapped in the most delicate lace gloves I’d ever seen, though somehow without leaving a sliver of skin exposed. “And I’m pretty certain the current iteration of your real maid uniform doesn’t have ... ” I squinted at her long skirt. “Whatever that inlaid geometric pattern is meant to be. Very fancy. Gosh, you’re halfway to evening gown in that, never mind maid. Nice boots, too. Very, um, stompy.”

Horror muttered, “Good for kicking in heads, no doubt.”

Praem opened her lips with a soft click, then spoke in a voice like the ringing of silver bells amid a tower of ice.

“A maid is still a maid, even in a dream,” she said. “And I have been a bad girl.”

Abyssal Heather let out a soft hisssss. “Don’t feel bad, Praem. Heather’s been worse.”

Praem looked up at me again. “Yes.”

“W-what?” I stammered. “I’ve been a ‘bad girl’? Praem, you were there with us in the Governor’s Office, you know I’m not the bad one, it’s the other me, the bi— ah!”

Without the Praem Plushie anchoring me to Eileen’s back, I was finding it much more difficult to stay situated. The throbbing in my left shin was very bad, a few droplets of blood were falling from the left cuff of my pajama bottoms, and my guts were burning like a banked fire with every minor adjustment of my muscles. I struggled for a moment to wrap my arm back around Eileen's front. She did her best to help, but even with her steady strength there was only so much she could achieve.

Praem stepped up beside me and slipped the Plushie back into the front of my yellow blanket. The Praem Plushie anchored me once again, her little fabric arms exerting the grip and strength of Praem herself.

"But," I protested, "Praem, it's you, it's part of you. And you only just got yourself back together!"

"Yes," she said.

"And you—"

"Yes."

"... thank you, Praem. I love you."

Abyssally Beautiful Me agreed: "Love youuuu."

"Yes," said Praem.

Eileen turned her pinkly-glowing eyes on Praem as well. "Thank you, for everything you have done—"

"Yes."

"—granddaughter?"

Praem said nothing.

Eileen said: "Silence may be golden, but it is not currency. Am I to attempt another form of payment?"

"I am not a granddaughter, I am a maid."

Eileen said, "You may have made yourself a maid, but the one who made you was not a maid, but a maiden, and did not treat you as a maid or maiden made, until Heather made you whole with a name, and finished your making. Therefore, you are my granddaughter."

Praem stared into Eileen's pink eyes, like sunset reflected off shimmering sea. She did not smile, but I saw something akin to deep amusement behind those milk-white empty orbs.

“Grand Maid?” Eileen tried one more time. “It is not a word, but I understand we can invent those now.”

“Maids are grand,” said Praem. “Grand Maid is grander still.”

“Oh my gosh,” I whispered, more to myself than either of them. “Granddaughter. Right. Evelyn is going to have the mother of all freak outs.”

Eileen tried to look up at my face. “Heather, you punned.”

“I did?”

“You did!”

Part of me revelled in seeing this — my surrogate daughter (one of two, if one included Tenny, which one should and must) and my surrogate mother, negotiating the starting line of this new relationship, right in the middle of a victorious revolutionary march. All around us, patients and ex-nurses were still helping others up, dressing wounds, clapping shoulders, taking a breather amid the unravelling dream.

But another part of me felt terrible guilt; here I was, enjoying the collateral fruits of the dream, while Maisie was still—Crack-crrrrack.

That sound again — that great glass enclosure, breaking open so slowly, far beneath our feet, locked in the core of the Box.

For once I was not the only one who heard that noise. Heather Abyssal twitched as well, looking around and cocking her head, tentacles flexing and twisting, nictitating membranes fluttering across her void-dark eyes. Scales flexed and fur stood on end. Muscles pulled taut, rolling beneath her skin. I stared at her for a long second, overawed by the sheer arousal I felt at the sight of myself. But then panic blotted out the speck of lust.

“Praem?!” I blurted out. “Did you feel that? Did you hear that noise?”

“I did not,” said Praem.

“Me neither,” agreed Eileen. “Are there secrets secreted which cannot join our herd?”

Zalu spoke up. “Ma’am, I didn’t hear a thing either. Negative on strange sounds.”

“Ditto,” said Xiyu. “Negative zero-zero.”

Horror muttered, “Not that anybody cares, but I also did not hear. You’re hearing things, Heather.”

Praem looked directly at Horror, and said: “Correct. Nobody cares.”

Horror stuck out her tongue.

Abyssal and Glorious Me went hisssss, then said: “We must hurry onward. The others are already winning.”

“Is that what that sound means?” I called out as she turned to stalk away, back into the corridors of the hospital. “Is that us winning? Is that Maisie breaking free!?”

She glanced back with a look from the deepest ocean trench, cold and alone and afraid, down in the infinite dark which lay along the very bottom of all reality. That look froze my blood and curdled my thoughts. How could something so beautiful look so forlorn, even if only for a moment? All my former lust was suddenly mixed with protective affection; I longed to enfold myself in my arms and tell her she would never be alone again. If only she would join me.

But then she showed me her rows of razor teeth, and shook her head. “We don’t know what that is, Heather. Only you do.”

“W-what?! But I have no idea, the Lonely Me in the Box was keeping it imprisoned, I don’t-”

“We don’t have time for speculation,” she hissed. “We need to save the rest. Or don’t you care?”

“Of course I care!” I cried out. “Eileen, follow her!” I raised Horror’s head, rallying my troops. “Everyone, everybody, we move onward again! To liberate the rest of the hospital! Onward!”

Abyssal and Razor-Clean Me turned and stalked away, her passing pulling at the attention of so many patients and inmates. Knights turned to follow, patients rejoined the mob, Zalu and Xiyu formed up either side of Eileen. The great mass of ex-nurses behind us fell in line.

We followed truth and beauty, plunging once more through the winding corridors of Cygnet Asylum.

Less than three minutes later, we stumbled into Lozzie.

Our Lozzie — our surrogate sister forever, no matter the blood in her veins — was in little need of rescue. She and her elite group of well-armed girls were waiting for us by the smashed-open wreckage of a fire door, which led down into the dark access tunnels beneath the hospital. All around them lay the bound and gagged forms of over a dozen nurses — already starting to lose their monstrous features and transform back into human forms, as our triumphant procession reached Lozzie's position.

Lozzie herself was hanging off the arm of a second Heather abyssus.

Lozzie was treating that Abyssal Heather like a delightful squeeze toy; she was half-wrapped in tentacles, rubbing her face against the scales and fur, giggling and purring, running her hands along spikes and spines and nuzzling against the plated and armoured neck of this Perfect Version of Me. Envy blossomed in my heart, for I longed so much to do the same, to be in Lozzie's place and take the embrace a step further. How Lozzie avoided getting pricked on toxic spikes or lacerated by rows of tentacle-barbs, I had no idea; this second Abyssal Heather had made no effort to fold away her sharp edges and lethal weapons, though Lozzie was perfectly unharmed. Her pentacolour poncho was stained with dirt and soot and more than a little blood, but she was glowing with a triumph all her own.

Behind me, whispers started to rise from the patients I had liberated.

"It's her! It's the Lozzers!"

"It's Lozzie!"

"It's her!"

Lozzie lit up as we approached, bouncing upward in the arms of this second Abyssal Me. "Heathy!" she cried out. "And Heathy! Two for one and one for two! Or three now, three's a magic number too! And Praemy! And ooooooooooh!"

'My' Abyssal Heather trotted forward to meet this second, identical self — another tentacle, now two of six. The second Abyssal Heather slipped out of Lozzie's embrace to greet the first. They touched their tentacle tips together, then entwined their limbs, smooth muscle spiralling each around the other's grasp.

Membranous wings quivered and flexed and brushed in feathery caress. These Beautiful Twins pulled close, spikes and spines fitting together like puzzle pieces, their bodies a perfect match. They purred and trilled and made little clicking noises, then finally locked mouths in an open-eyed kiss.

A bomb went off in my chest — a meltdown of lust and need, thawing through my wounded gut and burning in my loins.

And here I was, alone inside my mask, left out of the embrace, denied reunion with myself. My lips quivered. I reached out a hand. “Please ... p-please, you two, please—”

But then Lozzie was right in front of Praem and Eileen and myself, wide-eyed and wide-mouthed, making a face like she’d been handed a unicorn puppy.

“Hello,” said Eileen. “You are small, but also large. A little bit like me. Why have I never met you before? I would have learned so much, just by looking. But looking respectfully.”

Lozzie gaped, starstruck. “Heathy,” she whispered. “Heathy, how did you do it?!”

“My name is Eileen,” said Eileen.

Lozzie exploded into squeals, poncho flapping everywhere, raking greasy blonde hair out of her face. “No!? No waaaaaay! Seriously!? For serious double extra serious not a joke yes? Yes! Yes!?”

“I chose it myself,” Eileen confirmed. “Do you like it?”

Lozzie squealed again, going red in the face. “Yeah!”

I cleared my throat inside my squid-skull mask, trying to ignore the lust surging through my body, and the pair of Abyssal Mes necking just a few feet away. “It’s a long story, Lozzie. But to make it short, um, say hello to Eileen, she’s my ... surrogate ... mother.”

Lozzie straightened up like a cartoon snapping to attention; I half-expected her body to make a boi-oi-oi-oingggg sound. She stuck out a hand for Eileen. “You don’t get a hug, not yet, but you do get this!”

Eileen just stared at the hand, then at Lozzie. “I only have two. Both are occupied with Heather. I must uphold her decisions.”

“Ooooooh,” Lozzie purred, then nodded. She grabbed her own hand and shook it in Eileen's place. "There. Now! Heathy!" Lozzie pointed up at my mask, then tilted her head sideways, her elation faltering just a little. "Heathy?"

“Y-yes? Lozzie, it’s good to see you, it’s good to see you’re not hurt!”

"HMMMMMMMMMMMMMMMMMMMMMMMMMMMMMM," Lizzie hummed. "I was going to say that we should take Eileen home, that we have to take her home, because her pun game is encoded in her name. But ... Heathy?" Lizzie tilted her head the other way. "Heathy?"

“Lozzie, what’s wrong?”

Praem said: "Heather is currently divided."

“Ohhhhhh,” Lozzie cooed, as if this made perfect sense — then turned and slammed a hug into Praem’s front, without the slightest warning.

Anybody else would have gone flying backward and sprawled on the floor under Lozzie's sudden 'glomp' — a delightful word I had learned only recently, but had been warned not to say in front of Eevee. But Praem took the hug like a cross between an oak tree and a foam mattress, barely even adjusting her footing. She gently patted Lozzie on the back several times. When Lozzie bounced free of the hug, Praem's maid uniform had not a single cuff of lace misplaced, not one crease where it should not be.

“Lozzie, I ... ” I struggled with a sudden feeling of dislocation. Was there something so wrong with me that it was obvious to Lozzie from a single glance? “Lozzie, it’s still me under here. It’s me, it’s Heather! I swear it! I’m not ... well I am divided, but ... ”

Lozzie nodded. "Mmhmm, mmhmm! I know, Heathy! And well done, well done, well done! You got the Box opened! Opened up!"

Lozzie did a little jig-shuffle dance on the spot, oscillating back and forth and making her poncho spin. Several of her elite team of girls noticed and joined in, copying her swaying motions. The dance spread to other patients as well, among those who must have known Lozzie only by reputation. For a dizzying second my ‘army’ almost turned into an improvised dance party.

The dream was so thin now that Lozzie could impose genre at will, with nothing more powerful than a twirl of her poncho.

But then I muttered, “It ... it wasn’t me. Who opened the Box, I mean. I was me, but the ... the other ... me ... ”

Lonely Heather, the version of me who had gone straight for Maisie without a second thought.

If she had not done that, could I have freed my Abyssal Selves? Without that other part of me, would I have overcome the nurses, and accepted my trauma?

Lozzie halted her little dance and cocked her head at me again. “You mean it was one of the other other Heathys?” She flapped a corner of poncho at the two Abyssal Heathers, who were now holding hands and tentacles, staring at us with those huge dark eyes, as if waiting for Lozzie and I to finish. “Like them! Aren’t they soooo pretty?! You’re so beautiful, Heathy! Look at youuuuuu! Look at you two!”

The Doubly Beautiful Heathers From Below both went hissssss at Lozzie, who giggled back and blew them a kiss.

“Uh ... t-thank you,” I stammered, feeling steamrolled by Lozzie’s affection.

How could she compare me with the blinding truth of those abyssal bodies? How could she call me beautiful, when I had the same face as the Loneliest Me, down in the Box? How could she call me pretty when, compared with those two, I was so small and rotten?

Lozzie bobbed her head at me again, then ducked low, as if trying to look upward and under the curved lip of my squid-skull mask. “Heathyyyy? Are you okay-okay in there? You sound kinda funny! Let me see—”

“No!” I blurted out, recoiling backward so hard I almost lost my grip on Eileen’s shoulders. “I’m not taking the mask off! I’m not let —”

Crick-crack-crrrrrack.

That hidden enclosure was still breaking open, somewhere deep down inside the Box, the cracks now deep and guttural, splitting apart metres of glass.

Both Abyssal Heathers turned on the spot, twitching their attention up and down the corridor, tentacles flexing, emitting faint hissing from their identical maws of sharp teeth. Either side of them the corridor was full of patients and ex-nurses now — untying the nurses on the floor, raising them to their feet, spreading the good news. Patients and nurses alike gave the Abyssal Pair a wide berth, and flinched when they — we, I — let out that double-hiss of soft alarm.

The cracking sound had cut off the rest of my sentence.

I'm not letting you see how ugly I am.

For a moment of dizzying vertigo, I felt absurd and stupid; but it was true — compared to those Abyssal Heathers, I was ugly.

Lozzie did not appear to have heard that cracking sound, not been shocked by my unspoken admission. She was already speeding on, her words gathering momentum. “Okay okay okay! Any-way any-way any-way!” she chanted, bobbing from foot to foot. I breathed a silent sigh of relief, my heart racing behind my ribs. The idea of taking off the squid-skull mask terrified me, as if Lozzie would be repelled when she saw the truth of my face beneath. “Have you seen outdoors, Heathy? Tenn-Tenns is here! I told her not to come into the dream, but she did anyway and we have to get to her and help her though I think it’s all just foam rockets and—”

“Uh, yeah, yes, of course, Lozzie, I saw her too. And Jan is up on her back.”

Lozzie’s eyes lit up with mischief and delight. “She’s come to rescue me! She’s soooooo sweet!”

“I, uh, don’t think it’s quite as heroic as that. But perhaps in principle, certainly.”

Lozzie thrust one fist into the air, a sharpened metal shiv clutched in her grubby fingers. “And meanwhilies down here we’ve cut all the phone lines and the internet cables and everything!” Lozzie broke into a grin — predatory, dangerous, with a promise of violence behind her teeth. My little Lozzie might be awake, but she was still part of the dream, and loving it more than she had guessed. “Nobody’s calling for help, not before we’re done! And ooooh, hellos!” Lozzie was instantly distracted by the sight of Zalu and Xiyu. “You’re both prettyyyyyy. Are you two from Mrs Eileen as well?”

Eileen echoed, in a whisper, “Mrs. Mm.”

“Not with her, Ma’am,” said one of the twins.

“We’re here to back up Heather,” said the other.

“Another very long story,” I said, trying not to get bogged down.

“They’re from Outside, and they’re on our side. That’s all you need to know for now.”

Lozzie threw me a playful, sketchy, skew-whiff salute. To my surprise, several of the patients she’d been leading did the same, mimicking the gesture. Lozzie’s mannerisms were infectious.

“Yes Ma’am,” Lozzie yelled. “Scary Heather Ma’am!”

“ ... scary Heather?”

Lozzie shrugged. “S’what you’re trying to be, right? Right!”

“I ... n-no, I’m just ... just me ... ”

The pair of Abyssal Heathers were already turning away and moving off down the corridor, clawed feet clicking against the floor, grey dawn light catching the iridescent sheen of their scales, drowned out by the subtle rainbow bioluminescence pulsing inside their tentacles, with matching tails swishing in the air, brushing tips, and parting again with little taps and touches. That sight grabbed my head, my heart, and something significantly lower as well. I shivered and gulped, feeling a whine rising up my throat.

Lozzie was tilting her head at me again in silent question, like there was something wrong with me. “Heathy?”

“Uh ... I-look, Lozzie, explanations can wait until later!” I said, nodding after my Two Tentacles. “We have to keep up, and reunite with the others! Eileen, Zalu, Xiyu, Praem—”

“Yes,” said Praem, and strode on ahead, maid dress swishing about her ankles.

Eileen followed, carrying me forward. Zalu and Xiyu shouldered their guns and took up position either side. Praem walked with hands clasped behind her back, like a head maid inspecting the work of her many girls. Lozzie’s poncho fluttered as she fell in with the other patients; she turned around and back-pedalled after us, waving her arms and her poncho at the crowd.

“Come on, ladies and ladiettes!” she shouted. “We gotta tear down these fucking walls and we ain’t donezo onezo yetzo! Yaaaaaah!”

A wild cry went up from Lozzie's revolutionaries — howling, chanting, squeals of delight, a roar from the prison inmates, and more than a few muffled whines as girls were swept off their feet and kissed by those at their side.

Because in the end they were Lozzie's revolutionaries, not my 'army'. This was not a war, I was just tidying up my mess, and I couldn't do it alone.

No, the real war was between me, myself, and I. Between me and Lonely Heather.

If only I could talk to her alone. Just her and I, in private, where our mutual ugliness could not be seen. Maybe then I could bury this guilt—

Crack-craaaaack.

We followed the Abyssal Pair — Truth and Beauty, I dubbed them, though they were impossible to tell apart — along the spiral which led to the outer shell of Cygnet Asylum.

Resistance was rapidly thinning out. The groups of nurses we overran were smaller now, no longer the hallway-choking zombie-like hordes of before; these were only stragglers and wanderers, the lost and the damned. The few patients we encountered were the same — individuals and pairs locked in dark rooms, terrified girls hiding all alone under tables, screaming for mercy and clawing at the nurses clambering after them, as well as those unlucky few who had already been caught, drugged and bound and wrapped in straitjackets. We enlightened those locked in darkness, offered a hand to those who thought they were alone, and cut free those who had been trapped, even if they needed carrying afterward.

No matter how small or mean or overlooked, nobody was getting left behind. When this was over, every patient would be free and every trauma would be accepted. Every piece of the dream would come crashing down. Cygnet would be over and done.

We swept through the hospital faster and faster, hot on the heels of my twinned Abyssal Selves. Sickly grey morning light poured in through the windows — always to our left now, providing occasional glimpses of Tenny's parallel progress; my beloved giant moth-puppy was grinding her way across the toy-tank battlefield outdoors, toward the vast dark steel edifice of the Box. At that distance I couldn't spot the shiny metal speck of Jan up on her back, only the bulk of Tenny herself, her velvet-black body and the white whorls of her fur.

Every time we spotted her, Lozzie would leap and point and flap like she'd seen the world's best dog. "That's my Tenn-Tenns! My girl! Look at her, she's so huge now!"

Distant echoes of that fight reached us through the stout brick walls — booming and crashing, the rip-tear of torn metal, the clatter of armoured vehicles dropped from a great height to smash open upon the ground.

Eventually the Abyssal Heathers led the way into a canteen, where our tidal wave of revolutionary inevitability slammed head first into the last true battle of Cygnet's fall.

This canteen was not the one in which I had eaten breakfast upon my arrival in the dream. That first canteen had been a sad and drab affair, plucked from my memories of the real Cygnet. Compared to this it may as well have been a pleasure palace stuffed with honey and dates and little dishes of caviar. The canteen into which we burst was unsuitable for any use, let alone for eating food.

The floor of cracked tiles was filthy with dark stains, both brownish red and reddish brown, the kind of stains which had weight and texture and offered a spongy cushion beneath one's cringing feet. The walls were worse, spotted with black mold and streaked with decades of water damage, perhaps once off-yellow or dark cream, but now reduced to soggy, sodden, slippery grey, as if the very substrate had been replaced by a mat of fungal infection. The tables and chairs were more rust than metal, and the metal was the soft grey sheen of unpainted lead. Rotten food lay discarded here and there upon cracked tin plates. At the rear of the room stood a counter from which food may have once been served, but had been overrun by a carpet of furry blue mold.

Many of the tables and chairs had been overturned, their rusty edges leaving streaks and scrapes upon the floor. In the centre of the room stood a makeshift barricade — a fortress of four tables turned on their sides, with one in the middle as a raised platform. That fortress was under assault from all four sides by the final mass grouping of monstrous zombie-nurses, numbering perhaps fifty or sixty, waves of ghoulish flesh and snatching claws, brandishing bubbling syringes and snapping lengths of blue nylon rope.

My family held that fortress, against the crashing waves of my trauma.

Eight Knights stood inside the square of overturned tables, knighting the makeshift walls of the little fort. They were in an even worse state than the Knights who had accompanied Praem through the labyrinth of the prison levels. Black helmets were cracked and shiny visors were shattered, showing glimpses of pinkish-red meat wriggling and writhing beneath their humanoid exteriors. Bulletproof vests were slashed and torn, whole segments of armour ripped open and hanging loose. Their guns were reduced to twisted lumps of jagged metal, having long ago run out of bullets. They clubbed nurses with their guns as the monsters of my trauma tried to swarm over the tables, reaching down past the barricade to push back the onrushing tide. Between and behind the Knights were perhaps a dozen additional Cygnet patients, the very last few of the lost girls of the asylum, doing what little they could to assist the defence.

But Knights and patients did not stand alone. Four figures fought beyond the barricade, sowing chaos and carnage to keep the pressure off the others.

Raine — grinning with every flash and fall of her machete, whirling like a cross between a rugby player and a ballerina, fighting barefoot and greasy and stained with worse things than blood. Zheng — half-naked in shorts and a torn-up t-shirt, covered head to toe in a sheen of glistening crimson blood, knocking nurses together with brute strength; Zheng still did not look like her usual self, shrunk down to a cruel parody of her muscle and mass, lacking her sheer imposing height. But that compact frame now held all her demonic strength, undeniable as the ripping grin on her face. Then, Twil — all werewolf, a ball of tooth and claw and bristling fur, darting about like a hound among hens; nurses piled atop her, but she was an unstoppable force, a coiling knot of muscle and sinew and snarling teeth. And last — myself, me, I, another Abyssal Heather, floating and fluttering between the others whenever any of them should falter, bringing down nurses at unprotected rears, keeping the little trio tight and together and more well-protected than they knew.

Inside the barricade, past the wall of Knights and patients, my family's little fortress benefited from what Raine might call 'fire support.'

Evelyn's wheelchair was up on the table in the middle, brakes applied, seat empty but for the coiled mass of a discarded grey dressing gown. Evelyn herself — still withered and wasted, her body so thin and fragile beneath a scratchy Cygnet t-shirt, with her one leg missing, and her eyes sunken with exhaustion and stress — was up, not on her own one foot, but supported and cradled and held aloft, by Another Me.

Another Abyssal Heather – Number Four? I was losing count — was helping Evee to 'stand'. Evelyn's withered foot rested atop abyssal claws, cradled in perfect safety so close to those razor-sharp weapons. The Abyssal Heather had both arms and four tentacles wrapped around Evelyn's body, cradling her from behind, supporting her weight with tendrils turned to plush cushions against her spine. That Abyssal Heather had folded away every single sharp edge and hooked barb. Her remaining two tentacles acted as a prosthetic leg, anchored at Evee's hip, their entwined tips played to take her weight.

Evelyn's eyes were wide with rage and satisfaction, her teeth clenched, her face flushed. She held a human thigh-bone in both hands — the fresh white of the newly dead, scraps of flesh still clinging to both ends, the middle covered in scrimshawed magic symbols.

Her mother's leg, stolen all over again. Evee's one memento, her revenge.

Evelyn clutched the bone-wand in both hands and shouted scraps of inhuman language from her raw and ragged throat, spitting blood as the syllables split her flesh. Any nurses who made it over the barricade were thrown back by coils of crimson flame, the product and pride of Evelyn the Mage.

A fifth and final Abyssal Heather stood a little way back from Evelyn, cradling a bundle of pale flesh and black clothes. She was not contributing to the fight, concentrating instead on protecting whatever it was which she carried in her arms and tentacles.

My family had done an incredible job of holding this little fortress, buried deep in the toxic stew of my trauma; without my support, they may have held it for many hours longer — but eventually they would have fallen. The nurses which fell beneath Raine's machete stuck their arms back onto their shoulders and rose from the bloody heaps of their own bodies on the floor. The nurses with heads cracked and broken by Zheng re-knit their flesh and came at her again. The nurses dashed apart by Twil always stood right back up, like weighted children's toys bouncing upright, re-animated by the terrible logic of the dream.

But my family did not fight alone. None of us did, or would ever do so again.

I swept into the rotten canteen on a tidal wave of patients and inmates and liberated ex-nurses, carried forward by Eileen, flanked by Zalu and Xiyu, backed up by Lozzie and Praem, holding Horror's head aloft with a cry of victory echoing inside my squid-skull mask.

My pair of Abyssal Heathers ploughed into the final scrum of zombie-nurses, tearing a gaping hole in their formation. Patients poured in, laying about themselves left and right with improvised weapons, ripping the gap wider, ruining the nurse's cohesion, flowing right past the surprised looks from Raine and Zheng and Twil. Lozzie joined them, a flittering butterfly of pastel poncho sprinting down the middle — pausing briefly to hug Zheng's naked, bloody form, and to plant a sneaky little kiss on Twil's furry snout. Praem proceeded directly toward her mother, as if strolling down a Sharrowford street.

Zalu and Xiyu guided me forward, riding upon Eileen's back. I cast about myself with the six baleful eyes of the squid-skull mask, felling nurses before us, driving them back into their human forms, leaving them panting and gasping down on the floor.

The battle was won within seconds. Eileen had carried me to the edge of the makeshift barricade, and there were no more nurses, no more living trauma, no more monsters in this dream.

A sudden echoing silence settled on the rotten canteen, broken only by the distant rumble and crack-bang of Tenny's solitary fight outdoors. The room shook gently under the pounding of faraway guns and the fall of giant moth-feet.

I panted inside my squid-skull mask, quivering with victory and anxiety both at once. "Is it over? Are we done?"

"Staffing issues have been resolved," Eileen said under her breath.

“Collective bargaining is so much easier when one is not alone.”

I tried to laugh, but I felt limp and spent, sagging against her shoulders.

Time and sound and motion resumed all around. The aftermath of the final battle of the Cygnet Revolution began to unfold — patients and ex-nurses came forward to raise the defeated back to their feet, to offer them my acceptance; eight Knights opened the barricade and limped out to greet those who had rescued them; patients collapsed with relief or exhaustion. Shouts went up as the patients and inmates began to organise themselves — “Is that everybody?”, “Anybody missing a friend?”, “We need a full roll-call, find out if anybody’s not here!”

And amid all that, my friends and family and lovers approached.

Praem mounted the table in the middle of the fortress and took responsibility for Eevee, easing her from the tender embrace of Abyssal Heather Number Five, helping her back into her wheelchair. Evelyn clung to Praem with an urgent desperation, but allowed herself to be lifted up and lowered all the way back to the floor, wheelchair and all. She raised a curious eyebrow at me as Praem wheeled her forward, then went pale and silent. Lozzie flitted among the patients, then hovered at the edge of our gathering group, hopping from foot to foot, overexcited at this penultimate climax of the dream. Twil dropped most of her werewolf transformation — once again retaining only her wolfish ears and bushy tail — then stopped dead to gape at me and Eileen. Zheng joined us, grinning wide; she shouted “Shaman! Victory tastes like steaming meat!”

Raine ambled over next to Zheng, skin running with sweat, machete held in a numb fist, and broke into a matching grin, beaming for me, at me, because of me. She raised her eyebrows at the sight of Eileen, and said, “Holy shit, sweet thing. Heather, my genius little squid girl. You really did it.”

The Five Abyssal Heathers joined their tentacles together, matching caresses, swapping quick, strange, otherworldly kisses with each other — though one stood slightly apart, still cradling that bundle of black clothing in her arms.

For a long moment, nobody spoke, our mutual silence laid upon the backdrop of patient voices and sobbing nurses and the distant crack-boom of Tenny's ongoing battle outdoors.

Everyone just stared at me, at Eileen, at those I had brought with me and what I had achieved. Everyone — with the exception of Praem — cast several fascinated glances at the Abyssal Heathers, and what they were all evidently getting up to with each other.

But eventually, attention settled back on me.

Raine blinked. "Sweet thing? You okay up there?"

I cleared my throat behind my squid-skull mask. "Y-yes, I just ..."

"Nah, serious question," Raine said. "Your wounds. You doing okay?"

I shrugged. "I'll keep. I'm ... f-fine." My heart was racing. My skin itched. My mask felt thin as paper. "Is ... is anybody ... hurt?" I asked, filling the silence with anything, the first thing that seemed right to ask.

Heads were shaken, shoulders were shrugged. Zheng said, "Yes, shaman! And it feels good!", then thumped her own chest. Raine chuckled at that, and nudged Zheng in the side.

Twill shook her head, and kept shaking. "Big H, I cannot believe what I'm looking at, yo. And who the hell are these two?" She gestured at Zalu and Xiyu.

"Yeah," Raine purred, with obvious appreciation in her voice. "Introduce us to these two spicy spec-op babes, why don't you?"

"It's us," said Zalu.

"Hello," said Xiyu. "We were plants last time we met."

"Oh," Raine said, eyebrows shooting up. She cracked a grin. "Nice, nice. I preferred your birthday suits."

Evelyn pointed at Eileen with her bone-wand, eyes bulging in her face. "Am I the only one here ignoring the obvious problem with this scene? Heather. Heather, start talking."

"Uh, yes," I said. "I know this looks—"

"Heather," Evelyn repeated, and made it sound like 'do not test me'. Her lips were still flecked with blood from her spell-casting, and she looked grey with exhaustion, animated only by irritation. "Heather,

I love you, and I am endlessly grateful that you are safe, and that you have just ridden to our rescue. But choose your next words carefully. If you tell me that you have seduced the fucking Eye, I am going to have some kind of cardiac event, right here, right now, and Praem is going to have to resuscitate me.”

Praem put a gentle hand on Evee’s shoulder. “Yes.”

“Oh!” I breathed a sigh of relief. “No, no! Not in the slightest, absolutely not. I’ve not made her into a lover, or anything like that. That would feel ... terribly wrong, gosh.”

Evelyn breathed a sigh of relief too, visibly sagging with an emotion I didn’t understand.

“She’s my mother,” I said.

Evelyn froze.

“Spiritually speaking,” I added quickly. “Not biologically. Metaphorically, I mean. By choice.”

Eileen opened her mouth. “Hello, everybody. It is nice to meet you. I am called Eileen.”

Raine threw her hands into the air, machete and all, and roared with a kind of wild triumph I’d never heard from her before, hard enough to make me flinch. Zheng copied her, breaking into a hooting chant of absolute abandon, stomping both feet and gnashing her teeth and waving her fists about. Twil blinked several times, then did a squint-frown, then finally got it; she winced. Lozzie covered her mouth with a corner of her poncho, stifling the giggles.

Evelyn stared and stared and stared. Praem stared too, for rather different reasons.

I waited for the cheer to die away.

“Um,” I said. “She’s on our side now. I’ve ... woken her up, out of a lifelong stupor, sort of. It’s very complicated to explain, and I don’t have time to go over all the details, but you can read the book she wrote, later on.”

“The what?” Evelyn squinted. “She wrote a book, what? Sorry? Heather, this is too much to unpack. Don’t even try.”

The bundle of black clothing and pale flesh cradled in the arms of Abyssal Heather Number Five shifted and uncoiled, and revealed herself as Seven-Shades-of-Blood-Goblin, red-black looking a bit teary, scrawny frame rather worse for wear, like she'd been recently tossed down a hillside covered in brambles.

"Told you the Eye was open in the sky, Eevee," she gurgled. "Told youu-urrrrk!"

Evelyn huffed and pressed a hand to her eyes. "Yes, fine. Fine!"

Eileen looked at Sevens. "Hello, Rainbow."

Seven-Shades-of-Sunlight spluttered with something only half akin to laughter.

"Sevens!" I said. "Sevens, oh, oh dear, I'm glad you're here too. I thought you were up on the roof!"

"I wasssss," Sevens rasped. "Fell off." She nudged the Abyssal Heather who was carrying her. "You caught me before I hit the ground. Still hurting. Urrrrr ... "

Sevens' trailing gurgle was undercut by the distant booming and crashing of Tenny's fight outdoors.

Evelyn raised her free hand. "Heather is right. We don't have time to unpack all this. You." She gestured at Eileen. "You ... I'm going to pretend, for now."

"We can all pretend together," said Eileen.

A horrible churning in my chest made me speak. "It'll make sense, I promise. We just don't have time for explaining the whole thing right now. We have to get to Tenny, and the Box, and Maisie, and finally end this dream. Don't we?"

To my surprise — and with a growing, gnawing, stomach-churning anxiety — my friends all shared a series of worried looks. Evelyn squinted at me, then glanced at the others, as if something was terribly wrong. Raine's beaming grin dipped in brightness; she frowned at me in thought. Zheng cracked her neck from left to right, then sniffed the air, as if trying to pick up my scent. Twil's bushy tail fluffed up with sudden alarm, ears twitching.

Lozzie bounced from foot to foot, capering forward. "Heathy's not all there right now! Praem told me alllll about it! Half of her is elsewhere!"

“That’s not true!” I blurted out from behind my mask, my cheeks suddenly burning in private darkness. “Well, um, no. I mean, part of me is elsewhere, but it’s not half. That would be far too much. And it’s not relevant right now! It’s not! We just have to keep moving and keep going so I can deal with it. So I can deal with me. I promise I can deal with me. I can.”

Evelyn frowned harder “Heather,” she said slowly. “Is that really you under there?”

Craaack-crack went that distant glass; the quintet of Abyssal Heathers reacted like a pack of hounds, twitching at the distant sound.

“Of course it’s me!” I said from behind my mask. “Evee, how could you ask such a thing?”

Silence seeped into the room, broken by the boom and crash from Tenny’s lone battle.

And I realised, with horrifying clarity, that none of my friends had approached me. None of them had stepped forward. My friends, my family, those I loved and trusted, they stood well beyond arm’s length, in a semi-circle of examination, with I and Eileen at the centre.

Evelyn didn’t answer.

“Yeeeeeeeah,” Twil said eventually. “Big H, I’m not like, being rude, or looking a gift horse in the mouth after you just rode in and saved us all and shit, but there’s something not right about you, like. And I’m not talking about the nurse’s head swinging from your fist.”

“Hello there,” Horror said. “Twillamina, you’re looking well and—”

“Shut the fuck up, stump-head,” Twil said, “or I’ll come finish the job.”

Seven-Shades-of-Sunlight said, “Mmmmm. Heather’s all ... fragmentary.”

Zheng let out a purr — soft and low, without her usual power. “The Shaman does not smell right. Shaman, what has happened?”

“N-nothing!” I stammered, panting and sweating now, horrified at the prospect of taking off my mask and showing them all what lay beneath — her face, my face, Lonely Heather staring out from behind my eyes, full of the guilt of abandoning her, abandoning myself, of—

Raine stepped forward.

She walked right up to me. I would have flinched away and clutched my squid-skull mask to my head, but Eileen was my legs, and she did not comprehend.

Raine — glowing with sweat and love, her eyes meeting my empty sockets without fear, her chestnut brown hair raked back over her head — stopped, and put her free hand on my thigh.

“Sweet thing, it’s only me.”

“ ... R-Raine, don’t ... ”

“I can tell,” she murmured. “I may only be half awake, but I can tell, sure as I can look up at the sky and see the sun.”

My throat was dry. My lips were glue. When I parted them, they hurt. “Tell what?” I whispered.

“That we’re only talking to half of you, Heather. Where’s the rest of my girl gotten to, hey?”

And with those words, a mighty breaking split my ears, louder and longer and more final than any I had yet heard. The ground shook and the walls trembled. Patients and inmates and ex-nurses screamed. My friends felt it happen, heard every moment. The creaking and cracking was no longer confined to the space beneath the asylum and the space between my ears.

This prison break was for everybody now.

Crack!

bedlam boundary – 24.34

Craaaaack-crunch-skeeeereeeeeekt-crrrkang!

Cracking and crunching, ripping and tearing, breaking and bending and bursting; it was the single loudest sound I had ever heard, Outside or on Earth, in dreams or in the waking world — a hundred-car pile-up on a busy motorway, crossed with the implosion of a continent made from crystal and diamond. An almighty dream-quake vibrated through the filthy floors and up the mottled grey walls of the dirty little canteen, shaking dust and debris loose from the ceiling tiles, rattling the rusty tables and chairs against each other, drawing gasps and screams from every throat. Liberated patients and ex-nurses alike clung together, gone wide-eyed with instinctive terror. All around me, my friends froze in panic, while I clutched all that much tighter to Eileen's shoulders.

This was no neat fracture in a glass aquarium, no matter how large. This was not a straight little fissure or a clean break in a single surface. This was the peeling back of ruptured metal layers, screaming as they were torn apart; this was steel girders and mountains of concrete smashed aside and tossed high into the sky; this was reinforced walls shattered into masonry dust and scattered across the emerging visage of the monstrous titan they had once contained; this was—

Over.

The great cracking roar trailed off as suddenly as it had begun. The cacophony had lasted no more than a handful of seconds.

Aftershocks of falling debris and clattering metal came from somewhere far away, echoing in the vastness beyond the walls of Cygnet Asylum.

Dozens of patients and ex-nurses looked about in panting fear, braced for a second tremor, bewildered and confused in the way only an Englisher exposed to the unthinkable breach of an earthquake can be. My friends and companions had fared little better: Raine, right at my side, had her machete half-raised, as if she could fight an earthquake in a dream with the power of a sharp edge and a strong arm; Twil had tucked her tail between her legs and scurried over to Eevee's wheelchair; Evelyn had gone white-faced and frozen with fear; Praem was very, very, very still — the most anxiety she ever showed; Zalu and Xiyu, still flanking Eileen on either side, looked ready to execute what Raine later called a 'rapid advance toward the rear'; Sevens had buried her face in the chest of the Abyssal Heather who was carrying her; the other Abyssal Mes had ceased their constant heavy petting and turned outward in a protective ring, every muscle pulled tight, tentacles flared, lightless eyes thrown wide. Even Zheng had gone stiff, fists clenched hard, waiting for something to fight or eat or shout at.

Only Lozzie looked unconcerned, head tilted, one ear cocked toward the ceiling.

And inside me?

Nothing had changed.

That made no sense; I'd been ignoring the implications since those cracking sounds had started, but I was no fool, even reduced as I was. Whatever shell was cracking, the source lay inside my heart. But all those cracking sounds — had they been leading nowhere after all? Nothing inside me had broken open, no barriers had been breached, no revelations unfolded down in the dark secret meat of my soul.

If anything, I felt worse.

Behind the privacy of my squid-skull mask, my face felt like an unlanced boil, sweaty and shiny and taut with the pus of my guilt. I felt like sobbing for release, praying for the dream to end before I had to remove the helmet and show everyone my true face. I turned my head to whisper a half-formed plan in Eileen's ear; the battle, the revolution, it was all over now, our friends were safe — so if Eileen broke and ran for the Box before my friends figured out what was happening, perhaps I could steal a few minutes alone with Lonely Heather. Perhaps she and I could end this, between ourselves, with only the Eye herself to see my hands wrapped around my own filthy little neck.

But my lips faltered; I couldn't get the words out. Where had all my courage gone?

Before I could try again, my friends began to recover.

“Everyone okay?” Raine shouted. “Yeah, yeah, that means all of you, girls!” She pointed with her machete. “Any injuries, falls, bumped heads? Show of hands for injuries. Nobody?”

Twil joined in. “I think we’re okay! Like, emotional damage, yeah, but no real heat. Eevee, you good? Praem? We cool? We cool.”

Zheng grunted, “More noise and fury than motion. A trick?”

Raine glanced up at me. “Heather? Heather, what was that?”

“Uh ... ” I swallowed, trying to regain my bearings. “A-another Eye-quake?”

Twil spluttered. “Another?! When was the first?!”

Eileen said: “I do not quake.”

Evelyn shouted from down in her wheelchair, slapping at one armrest with her bone-wand. “Everyone stay where you are! If that happens again, we need to get out, before this whole building comes down on ... our ... ”

Evee trailed off, her words faltering before a strange sound carried on the wind.

A distant vibration — a feathery, fluttery, velvet-furred trill of triumph, a great and throaty “Pbbbbbbbbrrrrttt!” — sounded somewhere out there, on the battlefield beyond the hospital.

Lozzie lit up with delight, bouncing on the spot, throwing both hands into the air.

“It’s Tenna!” she cried. “It’s Tenna! That was Tenny, ripping open the Box!”

A cheer went up from the crowd crammed into the filthy Cygnet canteen, from patients and ex-nurses alike, punctuated with relieved laughter and plenty of mildly exasperated head shaking; even the Knights raised their battered weapons in silent salute. Doubtless half the crowd didn’t understand what they were cheering for, but Lozzie was the true figurehead of this revolution, and everyone understood the tone of victory from our dear little Lozzie.

Perhaps once this was all over and the dream was done, Lozzie could teach them about the wonders of Tenny.

Once the dream was done ...

My throat tightened. My face felt hot and shiny. Something shifted in my chest, pushing against the inside of my ribs.

All my friends relaxed too. Raine lowered her machete and laughed, grinning at Tenny's antics. Twil straightened up, untucking her tail, wolfish ears popping up above her dark hair. Evelyn sighed heavily and ran a hand over her exhausted face, a little green around the gills. Zheng roared "Tenny!", grinning like the mad, blood-soaked idol she was. Sevens scrambled around in the arms of the Heather Abyssus still holding her to her chest. The five Abyssal Heathers all relaxed their postures, reaching out to link their tentacles once again. I envied such easy connection. If only I could communicate with myself like that.

Praem said, "Tenny is a good girl."

Eileen replied. "Good girls have good dreams."

"Good girls get to bed on time," replied Praem.

"Time is not time for bed. Bedtime has no time."

"Yes," said Praem.

Raine thumbed at Eileen and said, "Look at these two, getting on like a house on fire."

Eileen said, "Houses on fire generally do not get on, or up, or down, or much of anything ever again."

Twil sighed. "It's a figure of speech. Bloody hell, is she going to be like this for everything?"

"Yes," said Praem.

Evelyn groaned in her hand. "Put me back under the dream. Please. Just wheel me about and wake me when this is over."

"No," said Praem.

I should have felt comfort, belonging, and safety; it was only a few hours since I had followed Eileen out of that antiquated little infirmary room, leaving my friends behind, but it felt like days had passed. Now we were reunited, almost everybody was accounted for, and we were safe. The revolution was over. The Box awaited. The dream was almost complete.

But all I felt was passive and vulnerable.

My courage, my determination, my resolve — it had all trickled out through my fingers. Should I not have felt those emotions more strongly, now that I was no longer alone? But the expected catharsis did not arrive. Instead, I wanted to flee. I wanted to jab Eileen with my heels like she was a horse, and have her carry me out of there, out of that stinking, dingy, filthy canteen, away from the patients I had freed, away from my friends, toward—

Crack.

And there it was again, inside my head.

This one was soft and subtle, a clawed fingertip tapping on the far side of cloudy glass. Still there, still within, still trying to get out.

Behind my squid-skull mask, down in the dream-wrought enigma of my body and soul, I realised I did feel something different now — cold air on exposed bone. No pain, no discomfort, only numbness and distance. I felt opened up, flayed raw, my innards on display.

My chest creaked. Something toxic and poisonous uncoiled inside me, writhing around my heart and lungs, as if trying to push out through my ribcage.

Lozzie capered from foot to foot, darting between liberated patients, hugging favourites and kissing the occasional cheek, followed by a train of giggles and thank yous and worshipful hands reaching out to touch her pentacolour pastel poncho. A wave of true release was passing through the crowd; everyone knew the revolution was over, the fight was done, the Box was open. Even with all these wounds and all this damage, the war was won. The mood of the crowd was shifting, spreading wide with smiles and gentle hands, turning toward the bounty of victory.

But not for me.

Before my friends could remember what they had been doing a few moments ago, I did my best to straighten up on Eileen's back and speak clearly.

"We should head to the Box," I said, but could not keep the tremor from my voice. "For ... to let ... to let Maisie ... t-to rescue Maisie at last, to ... to ... ”

Raine turned and looked up at me again, all ears. “Heather? Speak up, sweet thing, I can’t hear you!”

“I ... uh ... I want to g-go ... alone ... ”

The five Abyssal Heathers drifted closer as I spoke, parting from one another with gentle touches of tentacle-tip and feathery brushes of membranous wings. Five sets of void-dark eyes settled on me as they spread out and stepped into the gaps between my friends; five sets of predatory looks, five pairs of slow, languid blinks; five maws of sharp teeth opening to hiss with soft and sinuous breath; five click-clicking claws treading closer. My words faltered at their beauty, at the feeling their approach stirred deep down in my belly — instinctive prey-response fear mixed into a heady cocktail with quivering arousal and desire, then overpowered by a need to join, to become one, to be entered and eaten and consumed and remade.

My breath turned ragged. My belly clenched. I felt a whine rising up my throat.

One Abyssal Heather stopped by Evelyn, dipping a carefully smoothed tentacle down into her lap. The second stalked up beside Zheng, hissing softly until Zheng responded with a grin. The third slid up next to Twil, catching her attention with a flicker-blink of glowing eyes. The fourth was already carrying Sevens, and began to scratch her under the chin.

The fifth Abyssal Beauty walked forward, toward Raine and Eileen and myself.

She raised her six tentacles, smooth-soft as melting butter, pale as peach-fuzz, strobing with night and coal-dust and rainbows in the dusk.

She reached upward; she reached for me.

Behind my squid-skull mask, my lips quivered and my skin broke out in burning sweat. My hands started to shake so badly that Horror’s severed Head finally slipped from my grasp. The decapitated ex-Nurse let out a little yelp. Zalu or Xiyu must have darted forward to catch her before she hit the floor, because she grunted, then huffed with relief, and began to speak a complaint, but was quickly silenced.

Six smooth tentacles reached for me, framing the void-dark, coral-pink, sunset-orange of my own eyes, staring back at me from within a perfect abyssal face.

I reached out with both hands, extending them past Eileen's head, desperate to touch myself, to feel my own touch, to be touched, to end the boundary between the two.

"P-please!" my voice quivered. "Please, take me back, be with me again, be me—"

The six tentacles ignored my hands; the Abyssal Heather reached for my squid-skull mask.

I reeled away so hard that Eileen was forced to stumble backward, lest she drop me entirely; only the tiny anchor of the Praem plushie down in my yellow blanket kept me in place. Eileen staggered to re-orient my weight as I clung to her shoulders and squealed with a stuck-pig fear I had never felt before. I made an awful noise, screeching and spitting without the aid of abyssal biology; I must have sounded like a rabid chimpanzee, screaming my head off inside a slab of metallic bone.

The Abyssal Heather whipped her tentacles back. She opened her mouth and replied with a screeching hiss of her own.

Hissssssssssss!

Eileen was saying my name, several of my friends were shouting, but I was locked in a contest of volume. I screeched and squawked and squealed; the Abyssal Heather hissed and whirred, a sound like a rattlesnake rising up her throat. We screamed and howled and barked and—

Raine stepped between us, one hand raised. Her voice cracked the air like a whip. "Heather! Stop!"

That voice was like a hook in my guts and groin. I flinched hard and clamped my mouth shut, barely resisting the urge to whine. Apparently Raine's voice had a similar effect on the Abyssal Version Of Myself — and why not? She was me, I was her, we were merely parts of the same whole. Abyssal Screechy Me recoiled as if stung, slammed her mouth shut, then blinked rapidly, fluttering frilled lids at Raine.

My breath came in ragged little gasps. I was coated with cold sweat, clothes stuck to my skin. Eileen tapped my arms with her chin — I'd been squeezing so hard I'd put pressure on her throat. I quickly slackened my grip, mortified. Most of the liberated patients and ex-nurses were staring in shock, as were all my friends.

Raine broke into a smile — warm, confident, so much herself again. Had she woken up out of the dream?

"That's better," she purred. "Good girl. Or ... " She blinked once. "Isn't that what you're meant to call me, right now? Never mind. Just stop fighting with yourself, Heather. That goes for all of you squid-bodied Heathers, yeah? No more in-fighting. Or you'll get a spanking."

"Y-yeah ... " I croaked. "Sorry. Sorry, Raine."

The Abyssal Heather let out a soft hiss of acknowledgement, tentacles coiling in the air. Raine shot her a finger-gun, and threw me a wink.

Twil cleared her throat. "Big H, yo, what was that all about?"

Evelyn answered before I could speak: "She won't take off the bloody mask. Isn't that right, Heather? You still won't let us see your face."

I straightened up on Eileen's back as best I could, my mind working to deflect the question. "It ... it's just me under here! You can hear my voice, you can see my body! Can't you? Praem, Praem you saw me put on the mask, you know it's me! Praem, please, vouch for me!"

Praem said: "And yet."

"Wha— what does that mean!? Praem?"

"Heather, look here, please." Raine looked right at me, her gaze cutting through the dark eye holes of my mask. I tried to shrivel up inside; could she see me? "It means we can tell you're not all there," she said. "The dream's done something funny to you. Hasn't it, sweet thing? What happened?"

I could not tell her the truth, for I did not even comprehend the truth myself. I scrambled for an excuse — anything to avoid Raine seeing the hideous reality beneath the mask. I gestured at the Abyssal Heathers. "Why do you trust them, then!? I don't look like that! At least, not normally, though I would love to."

Zheng said, "Their faces are not hidden, Shaman. Though I know it is you under there. It could be no other."

Twil sighed. "This is confusing as shit. This is too many Heathers. Can't we just, talk to one of the ... alien ones here?"

"Ha!" Evelyn barked. "Yes, they are rather hard to deny, to put it lightly." She glanced up at the Abyssal Me by her own side. I couldn't help but see that cocktail of admiration, awe, trepidation, and a touch of something more in Eeve's eyes.

I felt sick. My friends didn't trust—

"It's not that we don't trust you, Heather," Raine said, as if reading my mind. She glanced around at all the others. "Isn't that right? Come on, we all trust her, don't we? She's just rocked through here with an army and saved us all. She's finished the revolution. We do trust her. We do. Anybody says otherwise, you gotta answer to me."

Raine received a chorus of nods and grunts; the threat seemed a little unfair, but I appreciated the gesture.

"But there's something wrong with you, sweet thing," Raine said, turning back to me. "We can all tell. It's like you're ill. Like there's something clouding your judgement."

Evelyn said, "What's the dream done to you? Lizzie said you're not all here, that there's half of you elsewhere. What does that mean? Heather, what have you done to yourself?" When I didn't answer right away, Evelyn half-turned in her wheelchair. "Praem! What did she do—"

"Eeve, no!" I yelped. "Please, I—"

Evelyn turned back around, glaring at me with a craggy frown, her face like a cliff-side etched by acid. "Heather. We need to know what the dream has done with you. Start talking."

"N-nothing, I ... "

"Or what you've done to yourself."

My throat closed up. My chest creaked with so much guilt that my ribs might explode outward and drown my friends in an ocean of toxic fluid from my rotten little heart. I felt fit to burst.

Evelyn said, "Heather, I insist—"

Crackkkkk.

“—because I love you. Now, what have you done to yourself?”

The pressure in my chest slackened. I swallowed, but couldn't get my own saliva down, like a bolus of food was stuck fast in my throat. When I spoke, my voice shook.

“Lozzie is telling the truth,” I managed to say. “There's another ‘me’ in the dream. A me who ... who managed to get inside the Box. I wasn't aware of her— no, wait, no, that's not right. She didn't even exist, technically, until I forgave Eileen. She was the other decision, the other way of doing things. She was determined to kill Eileen, instead of forgiving her. She was ... is ... all alone. Praem and Eileen know all about it, they saw the whole thing.”

Lozzie rejoined our half-circle of interrogation — bouncing past Eevee and Twil and glomp-smashing straight into the Abyssal Heather who stood before me. Abyssal Me whirled Lozzie around and set her back on her feet, sweaty-faced and panting with excitement and victory.

“Heathy's got twooooo parts right now!” Lozzie held out one hand, two fingers raised in a peace sign. “Two more to go with her six! Praem told me! One of them is in the Box, that's truuuuue. We gotta put her back together, it's simples!”

Raine flashed me an indulgent smile. “Put her back together, huh? With all the Queen's horses and all the Queen's ... girls?”

Several groans rose from the others. I almost laughed, despite the sweat on my face and the writhing in my chest.

Eileen said: “That was bad.”

Raine raised an eyebrow at her. “Says you, walking eyeball? You gonna do better? Come on, lay it on me.”

“Heather, back together,” said Eileen. “Not a pun, but a rhyme. I have not gotten used to those yet. I hope you will endure my clumsiness while I learn.”

Raine cracked a grin — a teasing and flirtatious grin I knew all too well, one that made my heart stutter and my breath halt whenever it was turned upon me.

Raine said, “I'd be real happy to ‘endure’ those clumsy hands, you gilf-mode cougar—”

“Raine!” I almost shrieked, all my guilt forgotten in one blazing moment. “She’s my mother!”

“Yeah,” said Raine. “She sure is.”

“You cannot!” I snapped. “I forbid it! No, no, no!”

Twil burst out laughing, wagging her wolfish tail. Sevens, still coiled up in the arms of an Abyssal Heather in her blood-goblin mask, got a worrying little twinkle in her eye. Zheng just grunted, vaguely unimpressed. Evelyn huffed, and said, “I’m too exhausted to be disgusted. Raine, this is not the time. We can address this fascination of yours later. Or not at all.”

The Abyssal Heather a few paces in front of us purred an affirmative — agreeing with me, not Raine. “Rrrrrrr-rrrr. Raine. No.”

Raine put up one hand in surrender. “Alright, alright, no gilf-sploring for me.”

“It is forbidden,” said Eileen. “But not for bidding upon.”

“Eyyyy, nice,” said Raine. “A little clumsy, but nice.”

Inside the privacy of my squid-skull mask, I smiled, despite everything, despite the writhing rot inside my chest, despite the painful creaking of my ribs. Raine had once again performed the emotional alchemy she had perfected over so many past instances — she had recognised my discomfort, even through my face of dull metal bone, and disarmed all my anxieties with laughter and outrage, turning the attention upon herself. I could have climbed down from Eileen’s back and kissed her. I could have thrown myself into her arms. I could have—

Crrrack-tap-tap-tap.

But as soon as I consciously acknowledged her technique, the anxiety came flooding back.

Here Raine was, leading me forward. I had grown passive and helpless. I had lost control.

Evelyn cleared her throat. “Lozzie has an excellent point. We’re stalling. Let’s get this over with. The faster we can end this, the better.”

Lozzie bobbed up and down on her toes, one hand waving next to her ear. “Yeah! Listen, listen, you can hear Tennts! She’s calling us!”

Lozzie did have a good point — and even better hearing. Muffled by the layers of stout wall which encased this deep and dirty core of Cygnet Asylum, a distant call of “Prrrrbbbbbttt-prrrrrbbbbb!” echoed through the morning air of the dream. Tenny was having herself quite the one-moth victory party out there.

Raine reached over and clapped Lozzie on the shoulder. “I’m pretty sure we can put Heather back together again. Let’s get to it!”

“Y-yes!” I agreed from inside my mask. “Let’s go to the Box, to ... to the other ... other me.”

Twil tilted her chin upward. “What’s this other you like, Big H? We dealing with your, like, mirror universe evil-self, or what?”

“Um ... she’s sort of ... ”

Unspeakably vile, wearing my own face.

Crrrrrack.

“Wait,” Evelyn grunted. “Twil, that can wait. I have a much better concern to raise, before we move.” She gestured with her bone-wand, pointing at Eileen. “You.”

“Me,” said Eileen. “I.”

Evelyn faltered at that response, but then gathered herself and said, “What’s inside this ... ‘Box’?”

“I don’t know.”

Evelyn frowned, sharp and hard. “You don’t know.”

“I do not possess this knowledge. I am unaware. I lack the information.”

“This dream is a representation of the inside of you,” Evelyn grunted. “And you don’t know what’s inside there.”

“E-Evee,” I said. “Please, she’s only been self-aware for an hour or two, she—”

“Let her answer for herself, Heather,” Evelyn grunted. “I still don’t trust this ... Eileen.”

Eileen said: “An answer is never for oneself, it is for not-oneselves. But I do not have an answer to answer. I lack the knowledge, because I could not see. Despite looking at Heather for so long, I did not see her, and therefore I have not known her for very long. The Box is not mine, even if it is within me. I am sorry, Evelyn. I am of no answer.”

Evelyn let out a huge puff. “Fucking hell. It is very weird to have you saying my name, whatever you are.”

“I can refrain from your name, but then I must name you again, and that is not my right.”

“No, just ... ” Evelyn huffed again. “Forget it.”

“It is forgotten.”

I spoke up in Eileen’s defence. “Evee, she’s telling the truth. She really doesn’t know. She’s given up all her authority, her control, her power. And I don’t think she knew what was inside the Box in the first place. It’s almost like it was something ... something she didn’t do ... something beyond her control ... ”

“Wait a sec,” said Twil. “I feel like this shit is getting beyond me. If the Box is open, why isn’t Maisie here yet? Why’re we all still ... you know, doing this?” She flapped her arms, still wearing the remnants of her absurd grey school uniform.

“I-I know,” I stammered. “There’s a glass tank inside the box—”

Tap-tap-crack—

“—a-and that’s where Maisie is!” I spoke over the sound inside my head. “We have to confront this other me, and then break open the glass tank, and ... and there’s Maisie.”

Tap-tap-tap, went the claw on the glass. Haven’t you forgotten somebody? Aren’t you forgetting me, Heather?

No, I snapped into the silence of my mind.

My friends and companions and lovers shared a series of odd glances. The disquiet and trepidation was plain as a blush in every cheek. They knew something was wrong with me. Did they know I was lying by omission? Did they smell the guilt rolling off me like week-old rancid sweat?

Why was I even feeling so guilty? Because my face — her face, that Lonely Face — was so vile? Or because of how I'd treated her, rejected her, cast her out? Or because of—

Tap-tap.

Evelyn sighed and started to ask another question, but before she could speak, Lozzie hopped and skipped and leapt away from us, throwing her hands into the air, poncho fluttering, delicate blonde hair going everywhere.

"Everyone!" she called. "Everybody!" Suddenly all the liberated patients and inmates and ex-nurses were paying attention to her. "Let's get the fuck outta here, girls! No more hospital, no more treatment, no more cells! Whooooooo!"

And with that, Lozzie led the way, skipping and hopping toward the double doors which led out of the filthy canteen. A cheer went up from her followers, an exhausted cry of freedom; patients hurried after her, holding hands, clinging to each other, older girls carrying the tired and weary younger ones, inmates from the prison levels propping each other up. Ex-nurses swapped ineffable glances, then nodded and followed along behind. Within moments a great snaking train formed, winding out of the doors and back into the hospital, heading for the grounds beyond. Where once I had ridden at the head of a conquering army, Lozzie now led a victory procession.

Raine laughed, Evelyn sighed, Twil perked up with wolfish glee. Zheng threw her hands in the air and roared with approval. Sevens was gently placed back on her feet to totter forward, bleary-eyed and a little battered; she reached Evee, then clung to a corner of Praem's skirt. Somebody muttered, "Guess that's our cue, then." Somebody else replied, "Sure thing, let's go pick up the rest of Heather."

The five Abyssal Heathers all locked eyes with me for just a second. They knew what we did. We knew what was waiting.

My friends and I fell in at the very rear of Lozzie's victory march, behind the last of the nurses and the patients; our role was over for the moment, our part in the collective finished with. Even my temporary lieutenants had peeled away now, their revolutionary roles forgotten, to join the mass of girls heading for the exit from Cygnet Asylum. Only the Knights stayed with me, forming up an honour guard to our front and rear, led by the steady hands and purple eyes of Zalu and Xiyu.

Raine stayed right by my side — more like escorting an invalid rather than acting as the right hand of a conquering general. The five Abyssal Heathers stalked in a pentagon-shape, with me and Eileen in the middle; I felt like I was caged, held carefully between a wall of tentacles to avert any escape. Evelyn grumbled in her wheelchair, but even in her voice the relief was palpable.

Cygnets Asylum — the hospital, the incarnation of my trauma, the prison of my soul — could no longer hold us. Where before it had formed an impenetrable labyrinth, a spiralling maze of corridors and hallways that had led the revolution around and around, never able to win the freedom beyond the walls, now it disgorged us out onto the hospital grounds in less than a minute.

The nightmare gave up, banished by dawn.

Patients and ex-nurses spilled out of the hospital before us, streaming out through a side-door, emerging into the quiet grey light of a day gravid with expectation, like the sky before a thunderstorm. We followed, back out into the grounds of Cygnets Asylum.

Fingers of clear, crisp, cold air slid up inside my squid-skull mask and cooled my burning cheeks. Eileen's shoes found the soft cushion of healthy green grass. Sighs of relief passed from many pairs of lips. Twil puffed out a huge breath and turned her face to the sky. Lozzie cartwheeled forward, poncho cutting through the air.

The putrid guilt ebbed back beneath my skin. Freedom tasted clean.

Ahead of us towered the gently swaying trees of the woodland which surrounded the hospital, framing the churned and torn-up lawns and the little brick pathways thrown into disarray by Tenny's battle. To our collective right, the grounds of the Asylum stretched away toward the front entrance — quiet and abandoned now, no more nurses to guard the doors, no more patients to trap inside, no more threatening than the sun-bleached shell of an abandoned skull.

Above the trees, in the sky, filling the heavens from horizon to horizon, was Eileen — the Eye, her true body, a vast craggy sea of black wrinkles split down the middle by a narrow slit of open eyelid. Silver light roiled and glimmered beyond that slit, pouring down upon the dream, like starshine from the other end of the universe.

“Holy shit,” Twil hissed, the first to stumble to a halt. Her bushy tail went stiff, wolfish ears pointed straight up. “Yo, is everybody else seeing this shit? It’s open! It— I mean, uh, she? You?” She gestured at Eileen. “You’re ... open?”

“I open,” said Eileen. “Eye, open.”

“Damn. Uh ... cool, right.”

We all halted. Every pair of eyes turned briefly to the sky, returning Eileen’s unwavering gaze. Not every one of my friends reacted with the same casual ease as Twil. Raine shook her head, staring upward in awe, then breaking into a slow laugh, as if she had realised herself the butt of a cosmic joke. Evelyn looked ready to spit — on the floor, at least, not up at the Eye. Zheng froze as if in a staring contest with a predator — the greatest of all predators, one on the same level as herself, still and tight and unsmiling; she slowly slid her gaze downward, to Eileen’s human body. Eileen stared back at her, until Zheng showed all her teeth in a shark’s grin, filled with razor edges. Praem and Lizzie didn’t seem bothered, at least.

Zalu and Xiyu said nothing, though they seemed tense with expectation; Horror’s severed head, cradled in one Twin’s arms, just swallowed, rough and dry. The Knights were unreadable; perhaps they knew even better than I that Eileen was no threat, not anymore. The five Abyssal Heathers all stared upward in unison, their eyes shifting through a kaleidoscope of colours; as one they all settled on a matching silver-grey hue, to mirror the deep sea inside the Eye.

“She sees us now,” said a familiar voice.

I glanced to the side and found Seven-Shades-of-Sunlight had reassumed the mask of the Yellow Princess.

She looked a little rumpled, her perfectly pressed white blouse and yellow skirt creased and stained for once, as if somebody had pushed her down a brambled hill. Her hair was swept back as if with one hand, her usual ruler-straight tresses thrown into artful disarray. The canvas of her umbrella was torn, though she held it just like normal, point down against the ground. Despite all the damage, she stood tall and dignified, gazing upward at Eileen's true face.

"I see what I shall see," said Eileen. "And we will see what I end up seeing. See?"

Sevens glanced at her. "That remains to be seen."

"Oh," said Eileen. "That was a good one."

"Yours was barely a pun, esteemed lady," said Seven-Shades-of-Smoothly-Sarcastic. "You need to work on your quick thinking."

"I haven't been thinking for very long," Eileen said. "It was easier when I was writing. But I will keep trying."

"Please do. I await your creations with great interest."

Evelyn let out a sigh like the dying heave of a steam-engine cresting a mountainside. "Heather, I know there's barely any point in asking this, but somebody has to say it. Are we absolutely, one hundred percent certain that your surrogate mother figure up there is not going to change her mind and incinerate all of us?"

"I can answer this," said Eileen.

Evelyn looked up from within her wheelchair, a sceptical frown on her exhausted face. "I'm sure you can."

Eileen nodded. "I can."

"... and?"

"Would you like me to do so?"

Raine wheezed with laughter. "Oh, she's wonderful. I can't get enough of her. I've known this gilf for five minutes and I'm already madly in love with her. I'm sorry, Heather, sweet thing, but I think this is finally bringing me back to my waking self. Who knew that all I needed was an older lady with a taste for puns and literal interpretations?"

Eileen turned her head to look at Raine. "You have used that word several times."

"Which word?"

"Gilf."

“Ahhhhhh,” Raine purred, cracking a grin. “You curious?”

“Stop!” Evelyn snapped.

“What does it mean?” asked Eileen.

“It means you,” Raine said.

“But what does it—”

I sighed. “They’re from the internet, and we’re not introducing you to that. Not yet, anyway. Raine, please—”

“Can’t help myself, Heather, she—”

“Stop!” Evelyn snapped again. “All of you, just stop. And Twil, stop giggling! We are still in the middle of a dream, this is not over. And you,” she jabbed her bone-wand toward Eileen. “Answer the question, yes.”

“I no longer need to look so closely,” said Eileen. “All I can see is all I can see. I change my mind all the time, but my nature is changed already.”

Evelyn sighed. “That answers nothing.”

“Evee,” said Raine. “Hey, we’re all in one piece. I’m inclined to trust her.”

Evelyn rolled her eyes. “Yes, because for some insane reason I cannot figure out, you’re trying to flirt with her.”

Raine cracked a grin. “Not like we have much choice, anyway.” She gestured at the lawns in front of us. “See?”

None of the liberated patients or ex-nurses seemed to care about the giant eyeball in the sky, let alone the cracked eyelid or the silver light streaming down from within the world-spanning orb. Perhaps they couldn’t see Eileen’s true body, or maybe the taste of freedom overwhelmed all other concerns.

What had been our army and our spoils of war was now gently collapsing outward across the churned and ruined lawns of Cygnet Asylum. Many patients wandered away and flopped down on the grass, in ones or twos or little groups of friends, giggling and grinning and luxuriating in freedom, curling bare toes in the grass, closing eyes in drowsy midday naps, or just stretching out sore muscles upon the ground. Some of the inmates from the prison levels stood with their faces turned to the sky, arms held wide, crying silent tears at the touch of sunlight and the taste of fresh air. Many girls were hugging each other, jumping up and down in celebration, starting what would have been a wild party if not for the widespread exhaustion. Weapons were discarded, no longer needed. Wounds were tended to, blood wiped up, makeshift bandages torn from the hems of unwanted t-shirts. A few couples rolling on the grass were starting to kiss — and more than couples, in several cases, from which I averted my eyes as politely as I could.

The ex-nurses were just as spent. To my curious surprise, many of them were stripping off their uniforms, or at least the parts of their uniforms which marked them as employees of the hospital. Some nurses linked arms and started to head off toward the trees, with some of the more bold patients following them. Were they heading for the breach in the hospital's outer walls? Nothing lay out there but more dream. The only way out was through.

Other nurses joined the exhausted patients down on the grass. A few dozen were lining up, kneeling in a long row, facing vaguely in my direction, hands together as if praying. The reluctant nurses — the ones who had not truly given up the fight, but had to be taken captive and trailed along behind us — were freed by their former companions; they had nowhere else to go now, no fight left to take up, no way to reverse the revolution's victory; most of them just sat down on the grass, grumpy and sullen, all long faces and big sighs, though a few stood and frowned in my general direction, arms crossed, radiating disapproval.

Trauma was never truly gone and forgotten. Those ones would be with me forever, but I would make a place for them in my heart all the same.

A small number of patients stayed close to me and my friends — some of my former makeshift lieutenants, among them the leader of the first group I had rescued after leaving the Governor's Office. But they stood at one remove, simply curious rather than offering any help. This next part, after all, was no longer their fight.

It wasn't my friends' fight either. It should have been mine, alone with myself. But that control was long gone.

I started to sweat inside my mask once again. Soon, whatever I did now, my friends would see my face.

“Huh,” Evelyn grunted, looking out at the liberated patients. “Good for them, I suppose. But, you.” She glared at Eileen again. “We are keeping a close eye on you.”

Eileen made no sound. I couldn’t see her face from my piggyback position, but I saw Evelyn roll her eyes and huff.

Raine guffawed. “You set that one up yourself, Eevee!”

“Yeah,” Twil agreed. “Come on, that was a bit obvious.”

“You may keep as many eyes upon me as you wish,” said Eileen. “And I will keep mine away from you.”

“Fine,” Evelyn sighed. “Fine! Just ... just ... ”

“Observe,” said Praem.

Evelyn put her face in one hand.

A distant, gentle “Prrrrrt-pbbbbbbt!” rang out over the grounds of Cygnet Asylum, from far to our left. Lozzie hopped up like a startled hare and leapt away from the group, then turned and back-pedalled, waving both hands at the rest of us.

“Tenns is waiting!” she called. “Come on, Heathy! Come on!”

Lozzie didn’t wait for an answer. She turned and hurried forward, picking her way across the ruined battlefield, through the aftermath of Tenny’s one-moth rampage, a little pastel poncho fluttering through the debris. The rest of us shared a look, both at the sight before us, and the sight which towered in the middle distance.

The five Abyssal Heathers started forward, following Lozzie, but nobody else seemed prepared to move.

Then Raine leapt into action. “Hey hey, everybody good to go? Sevens, my girl, you’re looking a little worse for wear, sure you can walk? Yes? Good, great, I’ll carry you if you need it though. Praem, you sure you can get Eevee across all that ground in the wheelchair? Twil’s there if you need a hand. Zheng — haha, nah, I’m just kidding, I know you can take it. Eileen, you good with Heather up there, need me to, uh, carry you, too?”

“I am carried,” said Eileen. “For I carry.”

Raine nodded, then raised her machete and pointed forward, across the battlefield. “Alright, off we go! Watch your step, ladies and cephalopods. The fight might be over, but we don't want nobody treading on a nail. That means you, Twil. Watch those clodhoppers of yours."

"Oi!" Twil shot back. "I'm one of the only people here wearing fuckin' shoes! And I can regenerate! And my feet aren't that big! Fuck you, Raine!"

Raine turned, cackling with laughter, and led the way across the battlefield.

Tenny had left quite an incredible mess in her wake — though to be fair to our dutiful, devoted, delightful moth-daughter, the wreckage and wrack and ruin was hardly all her fault.

A long swathe of lawns and flowerbeds and little copses of trees had been scored and torn up and smashed down by a combination of Tenny's incredible bulk, the scooting and zooming of the half-dozen half-grown Caterpillars she had protected and herded, and the opposition forces of Empty Guards and their strange toy-like tanks and trucks. The lawns were punctured with deep holes from Tenny's moth-like legs, marked with long skids and grazes and ruts of turned-up turf, and scattered with bits of brick wherever an armoured vehicle had slammed into a pathway. Ruts from tank tracks had torn into the mud here and there, while overturned trucks lay on their sides by the dozen. Thousands of 'bullets' — little blue foam cylinders about the size of my thumb — littered the wreckage for hundreds of feet in every direction, punctuated by the larger evidence of the big rockets the Empty Guards had been firing at Tenny.

My heart hardened at the sight, reminded of what I had witnessed on the monitors; Lonely Me had been fighting against Tenny! Such a thing was unforgivable. Maybe I didn't need to feel any guilt at all, maybe she deserved every bit of—

Tap-tap-THUMP.

I flinched inside my mask.

We picked our way across the remains of the battlefield, around the bulk of overturned tanks and past the broken bodies of dozens upon dozens of Empty Guards. The tanks themselves were odd — even my inexperienced eye could see that they were too simple, all one colour, with smooth plastic-like corners and big silly cylinders for guns, too wide to shoot anything out in reality. The trucks and half-track things were even worse, all green on the inside like plastic toys.

The ‘corpses’ were real enough though, leaking oil and sparking with damage inside their robot bodies. Tenny had left them in pieces, shaken them apart inside their tanks, and hurled them through the air. Zalu and Xiyu led the Knights to either side of our group, checking the corpses as they went, making sure nobody was going to get back up and shoot at us.

Five Beautiful Abyssal Heathers ranged far past the head of our group, fanning out through the ruin of the battlefield, almost catching up to Lozzie up ahead.

Twil paused to pick up one of the big rockets as we passed the site of a particularly thorny knot of resistance, where several vehicles lay all tangled together. She straightened up and waggled the rocket in the air.

“B-be careful with that!” I blurted out from up on Eileen’s back. “It might go off!”

Twil frowned at me. “Eh? Big H, what are you talking about?”

“It might— you know! What’s it called? Unexploded something?”

“UXO,” Raine said, turning around to walk backwards for a few paces. “Unexploded ordnance. Heather, you ain’t gotta worry about that, hey. Relax.”

“Ah?” I blinked over Eileen’s shoulder. “B-but—”

Raine raised one hand. “Twil, here! Go long!”

Twil wound back her arm and threw the rocket like a javelin. I gasped and winced as the blue cylinder sailed through the air, Raine sprinting a few paces ahead to intercept it. “Raine!” I started to shout, terrified, confused as to why nobody else was reacting.

But then Raine ‘caught’ the rocket, no heavier than a chunk of foam. She stood there grinning, tossing it into the air and catching it again while the rest of us caught up.

“See?” she said, reaching out to gently buff Zheng on the stomach with the tip of the rocket. “Sweet thing, it’s just foam. It’s not real. See?”

Zheng ripped the rocket out of Raine’s hands and took a bite out of the blue foam, then spat out the remnants. I couldn't believe my eyes. This didn't make sense.

"But ... but the Lonely version of me, she was trying to ... "

THUMP-THUMP-THUMP.

"Tenns was probably having the time of her life out here," Twil said.

"Can we all concentrate, please?" Evelyn snapped. "Less horsing about, more eyes on the corpses."

Lozzie stopped up ahead, turned back, and called, "Did anybody hear thaaaaat?"

THUMP.

We passed the tangled plastic wreckage of a trio of tanks. The sight on the far side of the battlefield came into clearer view.

The Box — the true highest-security wing of Cygnet Hospital, a windowless grey steel enclosure festooned with watchtowers and searchlights and even a radar dish — was open. The structure lay torn wide across the top, like a tin can with the lid peeled back, curling into a spiral of metal. Naked steel girders hung from the ragged hole, trailing bundles of wires and bunches of piping, steaming gently as if boiling off some hidden chemicals.

Towering taller than the hospital wing itself was Tenny — a giant in velvet black and fluffy white, halfway to moth-shape, her catlike smile calling out "Ppppprrrrttt-brrrrrrrt!!!" as she spotted our approach. Several of Tenny's massive black tentacles still clutched the peeled-open metal of the Box, as if presenting her handiwork for our approval.

A tiny metal glint on her back told me Jan was still up there, still clinging on, probably still terrified witless. I couldn't spot the Saye Fox at this distance, but I trusted Jan's grip.

At Tenny's feet, a confrontation was locked in a stand-off. Six Caterpillars — not fully grown, but halfway there — backed up a line of battered, ragged figures, the rest of our Knights. A glint of Abyssal chromatophores told me the sixth and final Abyssal Heather was over there too. The Knights and Cattys and One Of Me were arrayed against the last stand of the Empty Guards; half a dozen figures in black armour crouched behind the wreckage of a huge circular vault door which led into the Box, backed up by nothing but shadows and darkness.

Nobody was firing, not yet. Perhaps they were waiting for our arrival.

“Heard what?” said Twil. “Lozzie? Did anybody hear what?”

Thump-thump-thump.

“Wait, wait,” Raine said as we caught up with Lozzie. “I can hear that. I can feel it, too. Everyone pause, one sec.”

We all stopped.

Thump-thump-thump.

My heart was racing. The noise from the inside of my head was now outside my skull.

“Holy shit,” Twil muttered. “What the hell is that? It’s making the ground shake.”

“It is beneath us,” Zheng said.

“Nah, fuck that, I think something making the ground shake is kinda our concern, right—”

Evelyn huffed. “Twil, she means it’s literally underground. What is that? Eileen, that’s coming from the Box, what is that?”

“A beating,” said Eileen. “From what? I do not know.”

Thump-thump-thump.

“It’s trying to get out,” somebody whispered, hoarse and quivering. “It’s trying to get out. It’s trying to break free.”

Thump-thump-THUMP.

It was only when everyone looked at me, that I realised who’d spoken those words.

“Heather,” Raine said, very gently. “What’s trying to get out?”

“I ... I don’t know,” I said, and it felt like a lie, even though it was true.

“Heather!” Evelyn snapped. “For fuck’s sake, you can’t just say that and leave us hanging. Do you know what’s in there, what’s in the Box, besides Maisie?”

“I don’t want to know,” I whispered, and felt tears rolling down my cheeks. “I don’t want to know. I don’t ... I don’t want to do this anymore.”

And that was no lie at all.

bedlam boundary – 24.35

Dread.

Thump-thump—

Not just fear — oh, poor fear is but a pale imposter dressed in motley, cavorting about the stage and pulling faces at the audience, to be ushered off at the turn of the scene or banished by the final descent of the curtain. Fear is a hearty little jester, confined to the boards, who cannot follow out beyond the plasterwork and glitter-paint of the theatre; if one so wishes, one may vault the orchestra pit and dance hand-in-hand with fear, without any real peril to flesh or soul. But, one might say, what about terror — fear's older, larger, nastiest sibling? Nay, not terror, not even a little bit of terror. For terror is a fleeting apparition, a trick of grease paint and screeching strings, a darkening of the lights and a rolling thunder beneath the floors; terror is draped in ragged black and wears a worm-eaten skull for a head, all to inspire the sword and the axe and the cleansing flame cut from cardboard and wrapped in coloured foil.

Neither fear nor terror can invoke the reality of dread.

Certainty. Inevitability. Unavoidable doom.

—thump-thump—

A wave of cold sweat broke out from every pore, sticking my clothes to clammy, cringing, curdled skin; beneath the paper-thin security of my squid-skull mask, my face was flushed with heat, my hair was matted and filthy, and I felt my teeth begin to chatter. My guts clenched like fists in the throes of rigor mortis, threatening to void me at both ends. Nausea clawed at my throat like a beast trying to get out. A weight squeezed down on my chest, pressing hard, crushing the breath from my lungs.

—thump-thump—

Dread. Worse than I had ever felt before. I, who had been ejected Outside as a teenager over and over again, I who had scurried through the rot and the dark and the madness that roiled at the feet of entities a thousand times my size. I, who had hidden among the sea-slick rocks, sheltering from the Gods of dimensions I could barely describe. I who had faced down the Eye, more than once, and won her to my side. I had been through so much — felt my body ripping itself apart from the inside, surfaced from the abyss and found myself trapped in the wrong physical form, surrounded by the pulsating meat and the glugging chemical factory of my own corpse. A year ago I had given up on life, and long before that I had been forced to give up on Maisie. That despair had marked the lowest points of my life.

None of it matched this dread.

—thump—

Because I knew, deeper than instinct or intellect, as I clutched Eileen's shoulders and stared across the toy-strewn battlefield, past the final stand-off outside the Box, past our beloved Knights and my Lonely Counterpart's Empty Guards, past the fallen vault door, into the blackness behind them—

—thump—

I knew that if I met that thing, the thing going—

—thump-thump-THUMP.

That I would die.

All around me, my friends and allies and lovers were trying to speak to me. But their words were drowned out by a single high-pitched note screaming inside my head; their faces were blurred, whirling together, a mass of meaningless flesh and teeth and eyeballs, smeared across the surface of the dream. Somebody touched me, a hand upon my knee. Somebody else placed their support against my back. Somebody else hugged my front. Voices asked if I was all right, calling out to me in concern and growing panic. Somebody told me they loved me. Somebody else told me it would all be okay. A third voice said my name with so much care and attention that a year ago it would have broken me.

None of that mattered now. The dream was turning to melted paste.

Dread is a terrible thing, when one has no way out. The universe narrows to a single razor-sharp point. There is nothing except that certainty, nothing except one's own—

You are doing this to yourself, said the Praem Plushie.

Her words were like a bucket of cold water over my head. I gasped and spluttered, heaving for breath, unsure how she could even speak, since I couldn't actually see her. The dream had become a churning vortex before my eyes.

"W-what—" I spluttered into the void. "What do you—"

You are turning the dream back into a nightmare, said the Praem Plushie. You won, but now you are surrendering again.

"But I can't— I'm going to— I won't survive this! I won't— I won't —"

Do what you were told to do, she said.

Before I could splutter another incoherent question, a face surfaced from the chaos beyond my self.

Raine, mouthing my own words back at me.

"I don't want to do this anymore?" she said. "Heather? What does that mean? Heather? Hey, hey, Heather, look at me, look at—"

Raine's face sunk back into the maelstrom.

I did not want to open the Box. I did not want Eileen to take a single step forward. Whatever that—

—thump—

—was, I did not want to face it, I did not want to know it, I did not want to acknowledge it even existed.

The knowledge would kill me.

Lozzie's face surfaced next — up on tiptoes, right by Eileen's side, trying to touch my cheeks beneath my squid-skull mask.

"Heathy! Heathy, she's so close! She's right there! We can't— can't leave her behind! You didn't leave me behind! You can do it, it's right there! We all believe in you, Heathy, so so so so so so much! Heathy—"

Lozzie faded out again, drowned by dread.

She was right, of course.

I would do anything to rescue Maisie. I had decided that long before we had embarked for Wonderland. Was dread certainty of destruction enough to stop me, to turn me back, at this final hurdle? Where had all my courage gone? My resolve and my determination? Why had I allowed myself to falter?

Praem — or whatever the Praem Plushie represented — was also correct. This was a dream. I was but one component of myself, a tiny part of the gestalt being that we all called ‘Heather Morell’. She — I, me, the whole — could not die here, not physically, not truly. Was I afraid of death, or merely the negation of whatever I represented?

Abstract thoughts were rather difficult, however, because the dread still felt completely real.

Evelyn’s face snapped into clarity, somewhere below and ahead.

“Cowards die many times before their deaths. The valiant never taste of death but once,” she said — and then she was gone.

If not for the dread, I would have howled with laughter; as it was, I merely spluttered a bit. That was not Evelyn, it was a quote from Shakespeare’s Julius Caesar. That was me, talking back to myself in this pinprick gyre of the dream.

She — I — was right, of course. To give up now, to fear death more than fear losing my sister forever, that would be like dying a thousand times. If I turned back here, I would die every day from this day forth; I would die with every breath, every twitch of my forlorn weeping. I would die with every second of life bought by my cowardice, my refusal to peel my lost twin from whatever cursed shell in which she had been sealed. The other parts of me, whatever they were, would never forgive this part of me, the part I inhabited right here and now, upon the stage of the dream.

There was my courage. There was my resolve.

Death before betrayal. Death before loss. Death before turning back, and leaving Maisie to her fate.

Behind my squid-skull mask, I closed my eyes as tight as I could, shutting out the whirling vortex of the dream. I squeezed and squeezed and squeezed, until the darkness beneath my lids throbbed red, until my pulse pounded in my ears and my body shook — not with dread, but with anger and focus and the heat of my heartbeat.

“Miles to go before I sleep,” I quoted at myself. “Miles to go before I sleep. Miles to go before I sleep. Come on, Heather. You can do this. You did harder things before. You can do this. You can do this. You can.”

When I opened my eyes I was free of the whirlpool. The dream was back, pretending once more to be reality.

The battlefield of overturned toy tanks and foam darts spread out before me, leading toward the Box. Eileen was below me, hands firmly grasping my thighs, carrying me secure and safe upon her back. My friends surrounded me. Everybody was speaking at once, almost as chaotic as the maelstrom of dream failure.

“—Big H? Big H? Yeah, yeah, I can see her breathing, see her eyes moving, she’s still—”

“—put her down! Yes, ‘Eileen’, I mean you! Put her down, there’s clearly something wrong with her, we need to—”

“Let the Shaman think! Let her think! She thinks and she acts, let her—”

“—Heather? Heather, hey, Heather, look at me, hey—”

“Hisssss-hisssss-ssssss—”

“She’s dreaming, deeper than us, deeper than—”

“Heather! Heather!”

“Heathy!”

“Pbbbbbbrrrrt?”

“Heather!”

Thump-thump—

How foolish I had been! Here was my strength and my resolve. They had been right here all along, by my side all this time, and yet I felt such a terrible distance from them since our reunion. Hiding inside my mask, an ugly and wretched thing, dreading what lay before me; I longed to take the mask off and let them all see my face, let them see I was still here. But if they saw, they would see my guilt, like rotten pus beneath my face. They would see me for what I was. Ugly.

They love you, said the Praem Plushie. That's why they're with you. To face dread alone, huddled in my shell — or to face it with my friends, no matter what they thought of me.

It was no choice at all.

Before I could second guess my decision or come down off the sense of unreality imparted by the swirling nightmare of a few moments earlier, I let go of Eileen, reached up with both hands, and yanked the squid-skull mask off my head.

Cold air, fresh air, filled with the smell of turned soil. My friends' and lovers' faces, blinking up at me in confusion and surprise. Raine was down on my right, one hand on my uninjured knee, deep worry and concern written on her face. Lozzie was to my left, one arm across my back, biting her lower lip in fear. Evelyn was frowning like I had hurt myself in some terrible way. Even Zheng looked concerned, as if she doubted her Shaman's health.

I felt like a wretched and vile little thing, wormed out from under a rock; it was good that Eileen was my legs, for I could not run away.

"I ... " I croaked. My voice was raw and scratchy, as if I hadn't used it in weeks. "I love all of you," I said. "I hope you know that. I ... w-well, I mean, okay, maybe not all of you, exactly. Zalu, Xiyu, I don't know you enough to love you, but ... um ... I-I hope that— hic— makes sense ... "

Silence. Wind rustled through the trees far to our collective right. A breeze moved over the desolate battlefield.

Raine broke into a laughing smile of incredible relief. "Of course it makes sense, sweet thing. Love you too."

"There she is!" Twil cheered. "Heather, yo, you alright?"

"Heathy!" Lozzie chirped. "You came back!"

"I-I, um ... uh ... " I felt tears prickle at my eyes. "I was— I was— gone?"

"Sure seemed like it for a sec!" said Twil.

"She needs medical attention!" Evelyn snapped. "She's concussed, or she's lost too much blood, or something else. Praem, Praem, go get her down off—"

“Heather is here,” said Praem.

Eileen said: “Heather is present. I present her. Presently.”

“What does that mean!?” Evelyn shouted.

“The Shaman is well!” Zheng bellowed — a notch below her usual depth, what with the reduction of her usual sheer size. “She needed to think. That is all.”

Raine said: “Heather. Heather, hey, it’s okay. You can cry if you gotta, it’s fine, I promise. You said you don’t want to do this anymore. What does that mean? Do what?”

I started to shake my head. “It doesn’t—”

“Nuh uh,” said Raine, sharper and harder than I expected. Her lips curled into a grin. “Sweet thing, you’re still the one most in tune with the dream. If you say something feels wrong, then something is wrong. And hell, even if we weren’t in a dream, I’d say the same thing. Your fears are my fears. Your worries are my worries. So what is it? Tell us what’s wrong.”

I swallowed. The words stuck in my throat, too tiny to face Raine’s kindness. I felt guilty and vile and ugly, and I could not understand those feelings.

But I told the truth.

“I’m terrified of whatever is making that—”

—thump—

I gasped. Something writhed inside my chest, poking at the spaces between my ribs, trying to get out.

“Uh ... that, that noise,” I said. “I’m terrified of what that might be.”

And it was more than mere noise; with every subterranean thump of mass against impediment, the ground shook ever so slightly. If a rain shower had passed over us to clean away the debris of Tenny’s battlefield, the puddles would have rippled beneath each distant shiver of the ground. My chest ached in time with the thumping, ribs creaking, some unseen horror trying to burst forth from within me. Guilt given form? Or something else? I tasted bile and blood in the back of my throat.

All a dream, I told myself. All a metaphor.

Evelyn snapped before anybody else could speak. "What's in the Box!? Yes, you, Eileen!" She jabbed with her renewed bone-wand. "What is in there?! I won't accept this anymore, not if it's scaring the shit out of Heather. What is in the Box? Answer me properly, or so help me God—"

"I have told you," said Eileen. "My answer remains the same. Unfortunately for all of us."

"—I will shove this wand—"

"Evee!" I shouted back. "Evee, she doesn't know! She doesn't know. It doesn't belong to her."

Evelyn turned her anger upon me. "Heather, I have never seen you this fucking scared. And yes, I could tell, right through that bloody mask! Something doesn't add up here. And she's the missing piece. Who does it belong to, Heather? Hm? Who else is in control of this dream?"

"Me," I said. "It's all just me now."

Evelyn clenched her teeth. "And what does that mean?"

"Maybe it's Maisie?" suggested Twil, shrugging, wolfish tail wagging. Everyone looked at her, but she just shrugged again. "Besides, hey, whatever that is down there going all bang-bang underground, it can't beat us now, right?" Twil gestured across what was left of the battlefield. "We've got me, Zheng, all the Knights. These two spec ops girls here," she added for Zalu and Xiyu. "And half a dozen alien Heathers, all spiky and stuff. Who's gonna go up against them? I wouldn't want to. Fuck that. No offense, Heather, just like, respect, real scary."

A distant "Pbrrrrrt!" echoed over the battlefield.

"And Tenns!" Lozzie said. "Tenns is on your side too, Heathy!"

Twil grinned. "Yeah, and Tenny, big style! Who cares if there's some giant monster down in the Box. Tenny's bigger, am I right?"

"Right!" Lozzie cheered, throwing her arms in the air. Another distant fluttery trill from Tenny floated over the remains of the battle.

Raine patted my knee again. "Whatever it is, we face it all together."

You got that, Heather? You aren't alone." She winked at me. "Gonna keep that mask off now?"

"I ... uh ... " The mask felt numb in my hands, as if it was a piece of me I had removed. I gestured with it, feeling helpless. "Could somebody ... ?"

Seven-Shades-of-Sunlight stepped forward, still wearing a mask herself, the mask of the Yellow Princess, albeit rumpled and creased, carrying her broken umbrella. She held out her free hand.

"I will watch over your face," she said. "I will treat it as you, kitten."

She took the mask from my outstretched hand. Now I was truly naked.

This part of me — whatever I was — still felt the most incredible dread of my life. This part of me might be about to meet an end. But I would see it through with the love of my friends. It was only with their support that I could rescue Maisie.

Had Maisie known all along that this would happen? That I would split myself into all these pieces, and only my friends would be able to put me back together? That they would see past the ugly guilt, and see only me?

"Thank you," was all I could say. "Thank you, everyone. I ... thank you."

"Heather," Raine said. "You know I'd follow you anywhere, right down into hell if you needed me there. We're gonna get you through this. All of you. Every last piece of you."

I nodded. "Yes. Yes. Come on, let's ... let's get over there, then. Eileen, continue walking, please. I'm okay now. Let's resume this."

Which was a lie. I was very far from okay. My heart was racing, cushioned only by the secret support of the Praem Plushie. My skin was slick with freezing sweat. My teeth almost chattered. My chest felt as if it was wrapped in bands of iron, and as if that iron was the only thing keeping my ribs from bursting outward with some lively awfulness.

But I wasn't alone.

Our ragged band resumed the short journey across the remainder of Tenny's battlefield. Myself and Eileen, with Raine at my side; Evelyn in her wheelchair, pushed by Praem; Twil and Zheng, Lozzie up ahead; Seven-Shades-of-Sunlight, walking on churned mud in heels, a minor miracle in itself; half our Knights, led by Zalu and Xiyu; five Abyssal Heathers, ranging far ahead, as if other parts of me felt more bold than I could imagine. Horror's head was clipped to Zalu's belt now, and kept her mouth sensibly shut, at long last.

We crossed makeshift trenches cut into the lawns of Cygnet Asylum, littered with rolls of barbed wire, rows of overturned artillery pieces, and piles of Empty Guard corpses. Twil and Zheng both pulled at the barbed wire, bare handed, and came away with clumps of spray-painted cardboard. The Abyssal Heathers clambered up the overturned big guns, hauling themselves higher with tentacles and claws, only to find the barrels stuffed with cotton wool and string, sporting payloads of big paper banners which read 'bang'. The corpses, once again, were real enough, leaking great pools of oil into the ground. A calm and detached part of my mind was thankful this was mere dream, else all those hydrocarbons would ruin the soil.

But I could barely pay attention to the sights we passed. All I could do was stare into the darkness of the Box, the dark mouth of that vault entrance, past the fallen door and the Empty Guards and the last stand of Vindictive, Hateful, Horrid Little Me.

We finally reached the end of the battlefield, passing out from between dead guns and empty corpses and collapsed trenches, parallel to the deep swathe of destruction cut through the whole thing by the giant form of a certain faithful moth-puppy.

Zalu and Xiyu and the Knights hurried forward to join the stand-off at the mouth of the Box, where the Cattys and the Knights faced down the last of the Empty Guards. A single Abyssal Heather, the final of the six, flitted in the opposite direction, to meet up with the other five as they closed ranks and greeted her with an embrace, swapping kisses and caresses.

The rest of us halted a good thirty feet from the rear of the stand-off, in the warm embrace of a familiar shadow, towering far above us.

"Ppppbbbbbtttt-btttt!" Tenny trilled.

Tenny's dream-self was beautiful, in the same way as my Abyssal

Selves. I had never gotten a chance to examine her up-close during the previous dream which she had joined. I had only ever seen her from a distance, over the rooftops of a simulacra of my home town, Reading, or in the final few moments as the dream had closed. Here, in this expanded memory of Cygnet Asylum, Tenny was close enough to touch.

Somewhere between five to six stories tall, towering over the torn-open rooftop of the Box, she had made herself into a true giant — a ‘Kaiju’, just like in those old timey giant monster movies she sometimes watched on her laptop. Her body was shaped like a cross between a moth and a jelly bean, all soft and rounded at both ends, with a series of long, thin, insectoid legs jutting out from the sides to support her massive weight; six pointed tips were currently buried in the soft soil of the lawns, while another six were resting on the peeled-open Box, as if she was leaning against her handiwork, showing it off for our approval. Her wings were folded back in repose, their work done for now, but a mass of thick black tentacles extended from beneath the shimmering surface of the wings themselves; many of the tentacles waved in the air, like she was celebrating her victory, but several of them continued to grip the edge of the Box, as if ready to rip it wider. Two tentacles had descended all the way down to ground level, to hover over the last handful of Empty Guards, poised to crush them to paste at the first sign of resistance. She wasn’t going to let the Knights or Cattys get shot.

Furred in luxurious velvet black and thickly fluffy whorls of spiralling white, she caught the silver light which spilled down from the slit-crack in the Eye, highlighting the tufts and strands of her fur as if beneath the grace of God-sent sunlight. Her face was a little snout-like, but still instantly recognisable as our Tenny, complete with a beaming cat-like smile beneath her big black eyes and a pair of twitching antennae.

Lozzie threw her hands into the air again. “Tenny! Baby! Well done!”

“Prrrrrbttt!” Tenny replied. Her high-pitched trilling noise shook the air, but not unpleasantly, like standing next to a jet engine made of fluff and felt.

Tenny’s sheer happiness was enough to push back the worst of the dread which still clotted the passages of my heart. Even if I died here, I had done some good out in the waking world, alongside Lozzie. Whatever happened here, Tenny was free, and had her whole life ahead of her.

I blinked a thin sheen of tears from my eyes. What if I never got to see Tenny finish growing up?

“Holy fucking shit,” Twil said, gazing up at Tenny’s substantial bulk. “Lozzie, you gotta stop her mainlining Mothra movies.”

“Too late!” Lozzie chirped. “Isn’t her cosplay the best?!”

Raine shot a smirk at Twil. “What’s this, wolfie? You scared of Tenny now?”

“No!” Twil tutted. “I mean just, like, I mean, she can’t do this in reality, right? She’s huge! We’d cause a national panic if she did this in Sharrowford, right?”

“Yessssss!” trilled Tenny. Twil flinched, then put her hands as if in surrender.

Evelyn huffed. “Stop bellyaching, Twil. She can do whatever she wants, we’re in a dream.”

“Glorious,” said Seven-Shades-of-Sunlight. “Well done.”

“Puppy!” Zheng roared. “You are huge!”

“Prrrrrrrrrrrrt!!!” went Tenny.

I added my voice, calling upward to my surrogate moth-like daughter. “Y-yes! Tenny, it’s me! It’s Heather! You’re so beautiful, and ... and thank you! Well done! I love you, Tenny! We all love you. Never forget that, okay? I love you, Heather loves you, I helped make you and ... and I love you.”

My voice trailed off as I realised what I was doing.

I was trying to say goodbye.

I clamped down on that emotion, cramming it deep down inside me. I could not let my friends and companions and lovers — least of all Raine or Evelyn — know about the dread certainty which coiled and bubbled in my guts, even if they were committed to stand at my side while I faced the source of that dread. If they knew what I suspected I was marching into, they might try to stop me. I had to be—

Ruthless?

Like her — Lonely Heather, the Vile and Rotten version of myself?

The paradox made my head spin. How could I be the ruthless one now, if she had separated from me?

Before I had time to let the implications of those thoughts blossom into a dream-splitting fissure, Eileen opened her mouth and spoke a single word which turned all heads toward her.

“Granddaughter?”

Evelyn scrunched up her eyes as if experiencing an instant and terrific migraine, hissing “Again?” Raine froze, eyes wide, swallowing a smirk. Twil started to laugh — then stopped.

Lozzie hopped into the air and did a full 180-degree turn, poncho spinning outward to either side. She landed on her toes, a twinkle in her eyes, and squinted at Eileen.

Eileen said: “Granddaughter number two? Via Heather.”

Lozzie raised a hand. “I’ll allow it! But it’s up to Tenny!”

Evelyn snapped, “This is all very heart-warming, but do we have time for this? I’m going to answer my own question — no!”

“Y-yes,” I agreed. “This is all very sweet, but we need to—”

THUMP.

“—get down into the Box.”

“Agreed,” Raine said, glancing around at the group. “Heather’s in charge of this. If she says we get shifting, we get shifting. Tenny, you’re a star. Thanks for the assist, big girl!”

“Prrrbt!”

“Hey, uh,” Twil said, shading her eyes against the silver light pouring from the sky. She was peering up at Tenny and squinting. “That’s Jan up there on her back, right?”

Twil was correct — Jan was visible, several stories up, as a dull grey metal figure clinging to the soft fur of Tenny’s back, clutching an even smaller blob of russet in one arm.

“Ah, yes!” I said. “Maybe we should call to her, see if she wants to come down?”

Raine stuck her machete in the ground, point down, then cupped her hands around her mouth. “Hullo up there, Jan! How’s it going?”

Jan moved one arm, barely visible at that distance, raising her helmet’s visor. A pale oval appeared in the grey blob.

A distant voice floated down from Tenny’s back.

“It’s going!”

Raine shouted back: “Fancy coming down? Joining us for the final stretch? Dream’s almost over!”

“I’ll stay up here, thank you very much!”

Raine blinked in surprise and glanced at me. I shrugged, a little confused. Twil and Eevee both looked rather perplexed as well.

Jan shouted again: “It’s a darn sight safer up here right now! Away from all the guns!”

Lozzie flapped her poncho. “Janny! Janny, it’s safe down here too!”

Jan went silent for a long moment.

Lozzie did a little side-to-side spin with her poncho. “I’lllllll protect you, Janny! Right now I’m extra double good at that! I’m spiky and sharp!” She waved her shiv in the air, edge glinting in the light. “Sooooo?”

Up on Tenny’s back, Jan paused and leaned forward, as if trying to peer down at us. A moment later her voice rang out again.

“Lozzie, is that you?”

“Yaaaaah!” Lozzie called. “Come down, Janny! I’ll look after you! Niiiiiice and snug!”

Jan put her face in one hand. Even at that great height I heard a tiny little clank of metal.

A moment later, one of Tenny’s bus-width tentacles dipped toward Jan, pausing only a few feet above her armoured form, the tip narrowed to a sharp-ended slit. Jan looked up and flinched, but some kind of communication must have passed between her and Tenny. The tentacle dipped further, then lifted Jan up by the scruff of her armoured neck.

Like a battered angel in dull plate-mail descending on the mechanical arm of a stage-machine, Jan was briskly lowered through the air, past Tenny's smiling face, and down to the ground. Her armoured feet staggered sideways as she landed, wide-eyed with terror inside her helmet. She still had the Saye Fox clutched in her arms, hugging her tightly to prevent a fall.

"Janny!" Lozzie cheered, running forward to slam into Jan with an armour-piercing hug. She giggled and smirked with a little bit too much energy; the power of the dream had not entirely left our Lozzie just yet. Jan looked halfway between awestruck and terrified, but did not recoil or let go of Lozzie. A strong mark in her favour, I thought.

Lozzie would be safe and appreciated with Jan. Another thing I did not have to worry about, once I was gone.

The Saye Fox wriggled out of Jan's arms before Lozzie's impact. She hit the ground with a gentle skitter of paws and quickly crossed to Evee's wheelchair, where she paced around Evelyn twice, then sat at her feet.

"Yip-yip-yap!" went the Fox.

"Quite," Evelyn sighed. "Glad to see you're safe ... um ... grandmother."

"Yerp!"

Evee's past, finally bridged. Another matter that I had helped heal. Was it to be the last? My heart was racing in my chest now that I realised what I was doing, checking off the matters which I would not regret in my final moments.

Thump! Thump!

My ribs creaked. My chest ached. Something inside me still wanted to get out.

Jan peered over Lozzie's shoulder, eyes roving across myself and my companions. She stared in open awe as the six Abyssal Heathers stalked forward to touch Tenny's descended tentacle, each one briefly brushing their own tentacles over Tenny's gigantic black limb. Tenny let out a happy little "Prrrrbit!" just as if I'd given her a hug.

Jan swallowed. "Uh, I'm not going to ask what exactly is going on here. Or who Heather is riding.” She eyed Eileen briefly. “Though it’s good to see you all, glad to see this plan worked. I would just like this to be over, preferably not with a final boss fight.”

“I am no longer a boss,” said Eileen. “But I am boss.”

Jan went even more pale. “Don’t— don’t— I don’t want to know. Okay? Just don’t— don’t tell me. Can we go back to the waking world yet?”

Raine said, “We need to put Heather back together first.”

“Long story,” Evelyn huffed.

Jan swallowed. “Right. Right. Okay. I’ll just ... I’ll just stick with Lozzie here, if that’s alright.”

Lozzie seemed to take this well. She hopped back and wriggled her hand into one of Jan’s armoured gauntlets, then threw her a saucy little wink.

—thump—

Raine pulled her machete out of the ground, made a circle motion in the air with her other fist, then raised her voice. “Alright, ladies. Everyone hang back a bit, okay? I’m gonna go check out this stand-off and—”

“Raine,” I said. “There’s no need for caution. I think they’re already beaten. We can just walk right in there.”

Raine held my gaze for a moment too long, with a mote of surprise in her eyes. But then she nodded. “I’m protecting you all the way on this, Heather. You don’t get a choice in that. Understand, sweet thing? You’re not walking in there alone.”

All I could do was nod, trying to control my emotions. “Eileen,” I said. “Take the lead, please.”

“Are you leading me, or am I leading you?” Eileen said.

I smiled a little. “Whichever you prefer.”

“I lead. I lean.”

Eileen strode forward, heading for the line of Caterpillars and Knights.

All the forces we had brought to Wonderland were accounted for now, assembled around that final door, the final portal, the way down into the Box. In the rear of the stand-off stood the six Caterpillars, their off-white carapaces dirty with mud from the running battle, arranged in a curve as if to prevent any escape. They were not yet fully regrown, each one about the size of a shire horse rather than an entire barn. As we passed through the middle of their formation, a series of soft little doot! sounds greeted us, six in total, one from each of the Cattys. I reached out to touch one of the carapaces as we passed, running my fingers along the flank of a good friend and loyal ally. I muttered a thank you beneath my breath.

Lozzie decided to hug all of them, running up and down the line, pulling Jan behind her.

Next were the Knights — all thirty finally reassembled in one place. Their fake security guard armour was battered and broken, visors smashed, helmets cracked, weapons reduced to scrap metal and damaged plastic. But they crouched in three solid ranks, taking cover behind a series of low metal walls which separated the Box's vault-door from the lawns. Each one of them looked prepared to go over the top and charge the defenders, even empty-handed as they were.

Standing tall, out in the open, without a scrap of cover, was the one Knight I had wondered over for quite some time.

"Oh!" I said in surprise as Eileen drew level with him. "It's you! And ... and you. Oh, wow. What have you ... done?"

The Forest Knight — the only one I was reliably capable of picking out as an individual from among the hive-mind — turned the blank mirror of his visor to look at me. He nodded once.

The Forest Knight had undergone quite a transformation. Like his siblings, his armour was battered and broken and his dream-wrought firearm was reduced to almost nothing. Unlike the other Knights, something else had flowed in to fill the gaps — a thick, gloopy, viscous goo, light brown like fresh clay. The goo had hardened into plates of armour over his security guard uniform; the plates were decorated with the same perspective-defying floral patterns as his real armour, out in the waking world; that was the only reason I could truly recognise him. Some of the material had lengthened into an imitation of his chosen weapon — a huge axe, held over his shoulder in an easy pose. From his arms sprouted a series of short tentacles, wriggling in the air, forming little eyeballs at their tips.

The Forest Knight and Mister Squiddy were working together, on a more literal level than I had ever expected. There was no time to investigate the implications right then, but I filed it away, for later, for beyond the dream.

If I survived.

And finally, right there, strapped to the Forest Knight's back, was the body Jan had built for Maisie — a grey and featureless version of my own body, limp and lifeless, without flesh or face, ready for inhabitation.

—thump-thump—

The rest of my friends drew up alongside us. A couple of them greeted the Forest Knight; Evelyn said something about Mister Squiddy, but I was barely paying attention. Eileen said something else, something that made Twil groan and Lizzie giggle.

—thump-thump—

Past the trio of low steel walls, opposite the assembled Knights, was the fallen vault door — a great metal disk lying on a wide expanse of featureless concrete, flanked by a pair of partially wrecked guard posts, damaged by the passing of Tenny's tentacles. Six Empty Guards — clean and shiny mirrors of the Knights, with working guns and intact armour — crouched among the wreckage, taking cover behind the rim of the fallen door and in the ruins of one of the guard posts. They were so still they looked frozen. Their submachine guns were pointed at the floor, as if in premature surrender.

Past the Guards and the fallen disk was the doorway itself — a massive circle of metal, set in a huge panel covered in electronic controls and little blinking LEDs. The machinery was wrecked, cracked by the pressure of the buckled walls. The doorway itself was bent out of shape; the vault door must have popped free like a cork.

Past that doorway was dripping darkness, lit by the distant fires of alarm-lights, like volcanism beneath the deepest of seas.

Thump!

And it — whatever it was — knew I was here.

“Heather? Sweet thing?” Raine said at my side. “What now? Those guards are armed, we can’t just walk past them.”

Evelyn hissed. “Are we certain this isn’t a trap? Heather?”

—thump-THUMP—

“Shit me,” Twil muttered. “Ground’s really fucking shaking now. We’ve pissed something the fuck off down there.”

“Yes,” I said. “Yes. It’s over. We’ve already won. She’s lost everything. She’s all alone now. We can just ... just ... ”

In my peripheral vision, the six Abyssal Heathers stalked forward, flanking the remaining half-dozen Empty Guards from both sides. Tentacles flicked into the air, sprouting rows of barbed hooks, their tips narrowing into razor-sharp points. Claws slid from well-lubricated sheaths. Jaws opened wide, sharp teeth dripping with sticky toxic mucus. Six hissing voices rose in six abyssal throats.

“Wait!” I shouted. “Wait, please. There’s no need for more violence now.”

The Abyssal Heathers paused, turning void-dark eyes toward me.

“There’s no need for a fight anymore,” I repeated. “She has nothing left. We only have to ask.”

Beneath me, Eileen raised her voice: “You there! May we see Maisie?”

Evelyn sighed as if at the end of her rope. Raine made a valiant but failing effort not to smirk. Twil snorted. Lozzie made a sound like a steam kettle. I appreciated the pun, but—

—thump—

—my heart was beating too fast to laugh, and my ribs hurt like hell was trying to break free from inside my heart.

By some miracle, Eileen’s appeal worked. A distant crackle of radio static crossed the no-man’s-land of the fallen vault door. One of the Empty Guards turned his head to speak into the little hand-held radio attached to the shoulder of his uniform.

From down inside my own chest, a voice crackled forth.

“Yes, that’s correct,” it said — Lonely Heather, Isolated and Desolate Me, her voice like lead and ashes, answering the inquiry from her defeated soldiers. “Stand down. I ... I think that’s the right terminology. Stand down.”

For a moment I had no idea where the voice had come from. Between the cracking inside my head and the thumping beneath all our feet, I was prepared to believe that somehow I had become my own Lonely Self, that her voice was channelled from within my own chest, that the dream had coiled backward on itself so hard that I could simply hear these things now, no matter how far away. Why not? Everything else was far beyond the rim of absurdity now.

But then the Praem Plushie peeked out from within my yellow blanket, holding the little hand-held radio which I had taken off the first batch of Empty Guards.

“Stand down,” Lonely Heather’s voice hissed from the speaker. “Let them pass. Let them in. It’s over.”

I accepted the radio from the Praem Plushie, with numb fingers and a lump in my throat. All my friends watched me, frozen with anticipation and surprise. Raine mouthed ‘Is that her?’ I nodded my head, though my neck felt like a steel cable pulling taut to breaking point.

My thumb found the main button on the hand-held radio. I pressed it, and spoke into the microphone.

“Tell them to throw down their weapons,” I said.

A long pause. Then a sob, distant and muffled, so that I could not be sure if I had truly heard it. Lonely Heather said, “Throw down your guns, everyone. It’s over. I’ve lost.”

As one, the Empty Guards on the far side of the fallen vault door dropped their guns and rose to their feet, raising their hands into the air.

The Knights swarmed forward, without need of command or instruction, though Zalu and Xiyu joined them; within seconds they had scooped up the fallen weapons and restrained the six Empty Guards.

“Don’t be too hard on them!” I called. “It’s not their fault! They’re not even really alive. They're just ... just her."

A limp and lifeless laugh squawked from the radio in my hand: "Ha. That's right. It's not their fault, Heather. It's yours. This is all your fault now. I hope you appreciate that I tried to protect you. I tried."

Anger and disgust welled up inside me, threatening to push a column of bile up my throat. I snapped into the radio, "You and I can talk face to face soon enough, thank you very much. How do we reach you? There better not be any traps inside the Box, either, or I'll—"

You'll what, I thought to myself — hurt her?

Lonely Heather snorted a dead little laugh. "It's a single route. Just walk in. I'll wait."

"Promise me—"

The radio connection cut out with a little 'fzzzt'. Lonely Heather had terminated the call. I tutted and hissed with frustration. She — me! — was so irritating and stubborn, I had no idea how anybody could ever put up with her behaviour.

When I lowered the radio and looked back up at my friends, I expected hard-nosed concern and practical frowns. Raine would have her machete ready to fight anything which my Traitorous Little Other sent against us, while Evelyn would be worried about tricks and traps and ambushes as we plunged into the Box. Zheng would be eager for a fight, and Lozzie would be flashing her shiv, and—

But instead the concern was gentle, and the frowns were worried.

Raine just said, "That was her, right? This other part of you? Down in the Box?"

"Uh ... yes."

"And she's all alone down there?" Raine asked. "You're all alone, down there?"

"... y-yes, but—"

Evelyn said, "I want to get down there, ASAP. I don't like the way her voice sounded, not one bit."

"Heathyyyyy," Lozzie said, a little whine in her voice. I glanced at her, but she wasn't looking at me, she was staring into the dark portal which led down into the Box.

"Spooky as fuck," said Twil. "That sounded exactly like Heather. I guess ... it is Heather? Another Heather?"

"We already have enough of those," Evelyn drawled. "And— hey! Wait! Wait for the rest of us!"

The Six Abyssal Heathers were already stalking forward, claws tapping over the fallen vault door, sliding back into the shadows beyond the circular doorway.

Raine hopped forward, machete in the air, more like the baton of a parade leader than the weapon of a revolutionary. "Who's coming down with us? Who's holding the door? Quickly now, people!"

The brief debate over party organisation was lost on me; I felt like a pebble whirling in a waterspout, waiting to be carried to shore. The Knights opted to stay and hold the exit to the Box, in case of an unexpected situation. Zalu and Xiyu did the same, overtly much more comfortable sticking to their dreamlike 'special operations' role than plunging into the heart of the dream. The Caterpillars couldn't come either, the walkway beyond the door did not look wide enough for even their reduced size.

Everyone else — all the friends and companions I had rescued, plus the latecomers of Jan, the Saye Fox, and the Forest Knight — moved toward the doorway together, with me in the centre of the group, still carried on Eileen's shoulders, hurrying to catch up with the clicking claws of the six Abyssal Heathers.

Did my friends expect no trickery? No traps on our path? Praem pushed Evelyn's wheelchair as if we were not descending into the lair of—

—thump—

—a great and terrible beast. Eileen carried me forward without comment. Raine and Zheng strode at my sides. Twil had her claws out, but no more than that. Lozzie pulled Jan along by one armoured gauntlet.

We passed beneath the shattered circular doorway, into the subterranean shadows of the Box.

"E-Eileen," I stammered. "W-wait ... "

“But you weigh so little.”

“Now isn’t the time for puns! I—” The shadows covered us, swallowing us whole. “Oh ... n-no—”

—thump—

But then suddenly, Raine’s hand found mine. She looked up at me from beside Eileen, beaming with all her usual confidence, hair raked back, muscles flowing and flexing beneath her bloodstained clothes.

“Heather, hey,” she purred. “I know you’re afraid, I can tell. But I’ve got you. We’ve all got you. We’re not leaving any part of you behind.”

My chest felt like it was going to burst. “I ... love you, Raine.”

“Love you too,” she said. “I’ve got you.”

The interior of the Box — the most high-tech, high-security, high-secrecy part of Cygnet Asylum — was exactly as I had witnessed on Eileen’s wall of monitors. A world of matte steel surfaces was studded with emergency lighting and ineffable control panels; metal walkways were suspended over sheer drops down into infinite darkness, winding a slow and silent path between vast glass-fronted aquariums full of murky water. Our footsteps clicked and rang against the floors, echoing off into the silent flashing darkness beyond the glass tanks, beyond the landscape of pipes and machinery, accompanied by only the drip drip drip of water sloshing and sluicing from shattered enclosures.

Many of the tanks were indeed shattered — glass lay in avalanche sheets down the sides of ruined aquariums, spilling into the void below, forming an underwater sea-shore of razor fragments and iceberg-blocks among the slopping effluvia of the broken tanks themselves. Vast quantities of water seemed to have filled some lower layer of the Box, drowning the machines and choking the walkways and burying the lift shafts. Dark shapes slid past, swimming in the waters of this newborn ocean — giant shapes trailing ragged membranes, reaching above the surface with clutches of pulsating tentacles, opening glinting jaws as they floated beneath our path.

“Fuuuck,” Twil hissed as we crossed one such section, her eyes glued on the steel mesh at her own feet; in the oceanic abyss beneath us, something with many sleek heads was basking upon the surface, floating at the very limit of our sight. A dozen jaws opened and closed as if breathing. Necks writhed and twisted like a nest of snakes, while a bloated white belly rolled beneath the still waters.

“Do not look down,” Evelyn said between clenched teeth. “Twil. Stop looking down. Stop it.”

“But—”

“Eyes up, girl. Eyes up!”

Lozzie cooed. “They’re all so pretty!”

“I wish I knew this place,” said Eileen. “But I do not.”

Jan was silent. Zheng rumbled like a tiger looking at her rivals. Raine stayed focused on me. The Saye Fox trotted along as if immune to such sights.

We walked on, heading deeper, down the one pathway which unfolded before us.

The six Abyssal Heathers showed no fear, ranging far ahead, scurrying across the walls, walking on the handrails, sometimes even diving into the waters below with a graceful swoop of wings and tentacles, only to surface again later, dripping wet and hissing with soft satisfaction. They led the way now — myself, confident and whole and striding free, where I was a mollusc hiding in my shell, carried upon Eileen’s back, cringing from the truth. I struggled to understand these transcendent beauties as part of myself. Had I ever possessed such clarity and wonder, before this dream of Cygnet? Would I have the courage to dive from the walkway into those dark waters, to swim with creatures which terrified mortal minds? It did not seem so, not then, not to me.

As we plunged deeper into the Box, we discovered the corpses of many Empty Guards — lying tangled on the walkway, slumped over the railings, or floating in the waters below. We passed automatic turrets with their electronic innards scooped out, control panels cracked open and eviscerated like carrion, security doors battered from their hinges and reduced to scrap metal.

“Holy shit, Big H,” Twil whispered in appreciation at one particularly complex looking automatic turret with the barrels bent and the gearbox fused into a mass of melted slag. “Your little alien mini-mes did all this?"

"She did this," said Seven-Shades-of-Sunlight. "They are all parts of Heather herself. The one on Eileen's back is just another part."

Hissssssss went one of the Abyssal Heathers, from up ahead.

Twil glanced at me, as if I was a finger, or a hand. She gulped and nodded, and we all carried on ahead.

Eventually — after ten, or fifteen, or twenty minutes' walk, for time ceased to have meaning, down here in the sump of the dream — an aquarium tank grander than any others slowly came into view up ahead. The vast structure loomed out of the darkness, as if the Box was a mere hollow space, and this was the core.

Wrapped in walkways and gantries, guarded by the dead shells of an entire army of automatic guns, lit from below by shattered red and orange warning lights, murky with darkness and depth and sheer crushing pressure, the aquarium tank towered — a hundred stories, a thousand feet into the air, taller and wider and grander than anything the Box could possibly have held. Mist and condensation drifted around the sides of the structure. Deep cracking sounds echoed outward from it, as if from an iceberg suspended in freezing seawater.

"Is that ... ?" Twil hissed.

"I suspect so," Evelyn grunted. "Heather?"

A lump had formed in my throat, while my mouth had gone dry. My hands were shaking, sweaty, skin prickling with heat. My heart went thud-thud-thud against the inside of my ribs. I longed to hide inside my squid-skull mask again, but then I would be alone.

Maisie waited for me, down there at the bottom of this abyss.

I nodded, just once. "Yes. That's her cell. Her cage. I'm sure of it."

"That pounding noise has stopped," Raine said, voice tight, muscles taut and ready; I recognised that look on her, that readiness for anything. She felt it too, or perhaps she was merely picking up on my own fear and resolve. "What does that mean?"

I realised with shock that Raine was correct — we had not heard the thumping noise in several minutes.

"It knows I'm here," I muttered.

“Heather?”

I swallowed. There was no sense in secrecy now, but I had no idea why this feeling was so strong. “It knows I’m here,” I repeated. “No reason to fight for release anymore. It knows I’m here.”

“And so are we!” Lozzie chirped.

“Damn right,” said Twil, cracking her knuckles. “You’re not here alone.”

“Never alone,” said Raine.

Evelyn sighed, as if all this drama was too much for her. But she nodded. “Heather’s not doing this alone. That much is clear.”

Above the central aquarium the ceiling of the Box was broken and shattered, peeled away in great layers of bent metal, where Tenny had breached the roof from outside. But paradoxically no silver Eye-light shone down through that gap, no hint of daylight reached the depths, no solace touched the core of this place, as if the conditions inside the Box had expanded outward to define the entire dream.

One of Tenny’s vast tentacles was hanging down through that gap. It twitched as we approached, then swung through the air to move level with us, level with the walkway. That tiny gesture heartened me beyond words. I whispered a thank you to Tenny, that she had managed to join us, down here in the dark.

Lozzie hopped to the edge of the walkway and reached out to pat the side of the tentacle. “Good Tenny!”

“See?” Raine said, smiling just for me. “You’re far from alone, Heather.”

The walkway led straight toward the central aquarium, terminating in a series of enclosed metal structures, like barnacles attached to the glass. In the middle was a structure like a box all to itself, stout as a bunker, windowless, the rear side flush with the glass of the aquarium itself.

The little steel room.

A single metal door stood at the end of the walkway, leading into that room. It was closed.

“Heather?” Raine said. “Heather?”

“W-what?” I could barely tear my eyes away. “Yes?”

“Do you want one of us to go in first? Or do you want to do it?”

My throat had closed up. My belly hurt like I’d eaten rotten meat. My skin was plastered with cold sweat.

“Can we ... ” I swallowed. “Can we all go together?”

Entering the little steel room was a blur. Raine burst in first, machete raised in case of some final trick. Eileen carried me through, right on her heels. The rest of my friends bundled inside, all rushing into the tiny, cramped, nasty little space. The Abyssal Heathers stalked in last, alongside the Forest Knight, as if they already knew what we would find.

Revealed to the naked eyes, the little steel room was sad and pitiful — a cold and empty space, walled in grey, with a little steel table and a little steel chair. Computers and control panels lined the walls, blinking their cold, empty lights into the chilly air. There were no Empty Guards left now, they had all gone.

The back wall of the little steel room was made of frosted glass, just as I had seen on the cameras in Eileen’s office — the exterior of the grand central aquarium in which Maisie was held, though we were much too far away to spy Maisie herself. The glass was cracked now, covered in a spider-web of broken lines. Little trickles of cold water seeped from between hairline fractures, pooling into a thin puddle on the floor.

A vast dark shape coiled and writhed far beyond sight, hundreds of meters away, hidden by the murk.

And huddled at the foot of that wall was—

“Heather!”

Raine rushed forward, going down on her knees, offering aid to my worst enemy. Myself.

Lonely Heather, Hateful Heather, Spiteful Heather. She was down on the floor, hugging her knees to her chest, dressed in greasy Cygnet-issue pajamas. Her eyes were rimmed with red from crying, her expression slack and dead with exhaustion. Her hair was filthy, raked back from the action of panicked hands. Her right fist was covered in blood, clenched tight around what I knew was the pebble, the little speck of grit in which she had placed so much meaning.

She looked exactly like me, in every last respect.

I felt sick.

Lonely Heather flinched away from Raine. “N-no, don’t touch me!”

“Woah, woah, Heather, Heather, it’s okay, it’s me. It’s Raine!” Raine said, but Lonely Me just shook her head, and shook with a dry sob.

“I just want to help, you’re part of Heather too. Heather? Heather, hey, heeeey, it’s okay, it’s okay.”

Others rushed forward — Lozzie, casting down her shiv, Evelyn in her wheelchair, shouting at everyone to calm down, Sevens, carrying my mask in one hand.

But Lonely Me had eyes for only me. We locked gazes. Everyone else fell quiet, as if the dream cleared the stage for this moment.

“I hope you’re happy,” she said.

“No!” I replied. “No, not at all. Not like this, not divided against ourselves. And not until I — until ‘we’,” I forced myself to say.

“Until we rescue Maisie.” I raised my eyes to the dark shape coiling far behind the glass. “But, what is that? It can’t be Maisie, I saw her before, it can’t be her. You wouldn’t explain to me, but I can feel it trying to get out. It’s been trying to get out, all this time. What is—”

The dark shape swooped forward, sliding through the water.

It was gigantic, a titan of the seas. It must have been even further away than I thought, because the motion made my head swim and my stomach lurch. Rainbow tentacles the size of redwood trees flickered in the murk. Membranous wings caught the fluid, propelling the giant toward the little steel room. Teeth and claws and hooked barbs scraped against fractured glass.

An eyeball the size of a car filled the glass wall, pressed against the cracks.

That eyeball was all the colours of reality — void-dark and peach-dawn pink and deeply dripping yellow. But it was oh so familiar.

Lonely Heather did not even turn to look. She stared at me instead, lost deep in despair.

“What ... what am I looking at?” I whispered, though I knew already, down in my heart. "It looks like ... like another abyssal me, like—"

"It's us," said Lonely Heather. Her voice was so dead and empty, as if she felt the dread and death that I knew was approaching. "It's you and me."

"But what—"

"You know what. We both know it now. It's the one thing we've been trying to avoid acknowledging all this time," she said, with slow tears running down her cheeks. "Guilt."

Dread stopped up my breath. My heart juddered to a halt. I wanted to curl up in a corner and shut out the dream.

"No," I whispered. "No. Don't—"

"Survivor's guilt."

bedlam boundary – 24.36

Survivor's Guilt.

A leviathan of truth, shrouded in the murk of an ocean hidden beneath the world; a pelagic colossus more tremendous and terrible than any mere self-hatred or internalised loathing. A hundred feet in length, all scales and tendrils and a million hooked barbs, slathered with paralytic toxins; a hundred thousand tonnes of undeniable weight, displacing a pinprick worth of water from that great shadowed sea. It stared back at me from within Maisie's aquarium, from within an eyeball into which I could have dived and lost myself, from behind a curtain of cracked glass, creaking and groaning under the pressure of an abyssal eternity.

She was me, and I was her. This component of myself — forgotten, abandoned, drowned but not dead — had grown so vast down here in the rotten sump of my heart. Heather Abyssal, subjected to all the changes of deep-sea gigantism, biding her time, conserving her resources, brooding over her plans. Until this moment.

She — I, me, myself — stared into the little steel room, unblinking and unmoving, with an eye the colour of both darkness and dawn.

My voice was all but gone, I had to grope for the words.

“But— I don't— I don't ... ”

Lonely Heather — the Other Me, sitting in huddle down on the floor, with tear-stained cheeks and grease-matted hair and trickles of blood seeping from between the clenched fingers of her right fist — said, “Don't deny it.”

“But—”

“How can you deny it, Heather?!” she shrieked, suddenly shrill.

“This is what you wanted, isn't it?! Don't reject it now, it's too late for that.”

“But I don't—”

“It's right there!” she screamed, going red in the face, glowing through her tears. “Look at the size of it! How can you pretend not to see it?! It's so big, there's nowhere left to hide it. And I've been in here alongside it, the whole time. You got to run around and have your fun little adventure, rescuing your friends, having sex with Raine, celebrating your victories, beating your trauma — and I've been in here, with the guilt! You wanted to see the inside of the Box, you wanted to win, you wanted to do this your way? Well here's your reward! Don't you dare turn away now. You don't have the right."

Everybody else started talking all at once, trying to say things to Lonely Heather. Her outburst, her panic, her pain, it drew the instant and unconditional sympathy of my — our! — friends and companions and lovers. Raine spoke to her in a soft, safe, comforting, confident voice, the same voice she had always used on me in the past, the voice which told me everything was going to be okay, the same voice she had used on our very first meeting. Evelyn snapped my name, our name, trying to draw me back out of the pit of despair with the same hard-nosed care she always had used. Lozzie hopped forward, poncho fluttering, angling for a hug. Twil called out reassurances, asking if 'I' needed helping to my feet. Zheng said something about how even in two, the shaman speaks wisdom. Seven-Shades-of-Sunlight called me kitten. Even Jan spoke a few words of comfort, though she knew me so much less than any others present. Tenny's distant fluttery trilling reached in from beyond the little steel room, full of care. The Saye Fox whined. Eileen took a step forward, still carrying me upon her back, as if she could scoop up this other me as well and carry her just the same. The Forest Knight somehow went 'clank', the closest he had ever come to vocalisation.

Even the six Abyssal Heathers drifted forward, tentacles waving in the air.

But all those efforts were in vain. Lonely Little Me screeched with pain and rejection.

"Don't touch me!" she shrieked, cringing away from Raine's hands, flailing with one arm, cradling her bloody fist to her chest as if to protect the pointless little pebble within. "Don't— don't— you can't — you can't—"

"Woah, woah," Raine was saying, calming her like a wild animal. "Heather, Heather, easy, easy, it's just me, it's just us—"

“She’s going to fucking hurt herself!” Evelyn shouted. “Somebody—Twil, Praem, restrain her, at least—”

“I don’t think it is our place to do so,” said Seven-Shades-of-Sunlight, her measured tone somehow cutting through the chaos.

I finally dragged my eyes downward from the Survivor’s Guilt. I looked down, focused on the Loneliest And Most Pitiful Part Of Myself.

“But I’ve acknowledged my survivor’s guilt,” I said. “I’ve accepted it.”

Lonely Heather stared back up at me, more exhausted than I had ever seen my own face in real life; she was me at my worst, at the end of my rope. The bags beneath her eyes, the twitching of her lips, the pasty pale, drained, bloodless complexion, the proof of borderline malnutrition in her shrunken frame and hollow cheeks. She was me, but done and over and ready to give up on life. Me but defeated. Me without friends or allies.

The puddle beneath the cracked window was slowly approaching her backside, each droplet of water adding to the brackish stench. She clutched her pebble so tight that her fist shook.

“More denial,” she said. “Really? I don’t have the energy left for this, Heather.”

“I’m not denying anything,” I went on. “I truly mean it. I accepted the survivor’s guilt, long ago. I didn’t lock it away. I didn’t pretend it didn’t exist. I didn’t deny it, or suppress it, or forget about it. I’ve never forgotten about it, not once. Every night, every day, even when I’m feeling happy or fulfilled, it’s always there. It’s gotten easier to deal with, that’s true, but the hole it formed, the wound, whatever you want to call it ... it’s never, ever, ever gone away. A year ago, when I first really acknowledged it, I spent weeks so torn up that I could barely think about anything else. Accepting that I left Maisie behind, that all this was real, that Wonderland, the Eye, all of it really happened?” I shook my head. “It’s one of the most difficult things I’ve ever done. The guilt never goes away.” I gestured from Eileen’s back, at the Leviathan of Guilt which floated just the other side of the fractured glass. “How can this be survivor’s guilt? Are you sure you’re not mistaken?”

Lonely Little Heather began to sob and laugh, both at the same time, both emotions contained within the same breath. She smiled at me with bitter recrimination through a veil of cold tears.

“You’re so— hic— stupid, Heather,” she whined. “You’re so determined to kill me, to forget all about me, that you’ll even deny —”

“I’m not going to kill you!” I snapped, my temper frayed to breaking point. “Stop making this all about you! I need to know, how can that be survivor’s guilt? How can this be possible?”

“—the evidence right in front of your own eyes!” she screamed. “It’s right in front of you! It’s right there! Look at it! Look at it and think!”

“I am looking at it!” I screamed back. “Why won’t you explain!?”

“Then you’re blind! You’re so fucking blind! You’ve always been so fucking blind!”

“Just tell me what I’m looking at!”

“Survivor’s guilt!” she screeched. “Fuck you!”

“Fuck you, too!” I screamed right back at her. My face was burning with heat. Red darkness throbbed in my peripheral vision. I tried to think of a Shakespeare quote to hurl back into her face, but up close like this, the disgust was overpowering, and all my intellect crumbled to nothing. “Fuck you, Heather!” I screeched. “Fuck—”

A blur of sharp steel sliced through the air between us.

Raine’s machete, severing the very breath which carried our mirrored rage.

Lonely Heather stuttered to a halt. My words swallowed themselves like a bile-scarred throat. We both blinked in shock.

Raine had stood up and stepped to an equidistant point between myself and me, machete outstretched, chin up, eyes gone hard. She slowly looked back and forth between us, lingering on both us Heathers. She wore the most unsmiling expression I had ever seen on her face.

“Stop,” said Raine, so very gently, first to Lonely Heather, then to me. “Stop. Stop it, Heather. You stop this, right now.”

Lonely Heather sobbed, “But she won’t acknowledge—”

I interrupted, “And she won’t tell—”

“A rose by any other name would smell as sweet,” Raine said. She paused, then broke into a smile, for both us Heathers. “See? You ain’t the only one here who can quote a bunch of Shakespeare to make a point. This is my executive decision, Heather.”

“Which Heather?” I asked. “Which one?”

Raine added a frown to her grin. “I can’t see no difference between you,” she said. “To my eyes, you’re both just Heather. Lonely part, ruthless part, rude part, it’s all bullshit. You’re both the same. And I will protect you, Heather, against anything. Even against yourself. No more self-harm.”

A great shuddering sigh came from my right — from Eevee, down in her wheelchair, framed against the cold steel wall of the cold steel room, with Praem holding the handles of her wheelchair. I’d rarely seen Eevee so pale and shaken. Her eyes flickered between us and us and us, staring at the giant eyeball beyond the glass with a tremor in her throat.

“Thank you, Raine,” Evelyn said, tight and tense. “I think I speak for all of us when I say that this ... this ‘inner conflict’ should be resolved as politely as possible. Please?”

Twil cleared her throat. “Yeeeeeeeah, let’s not provoke the giant Heather. Hey? Sounds like a plan?”

“Yes,” Jan added in a tiny voice. “I concur.”

Eileen said, “I agree also. Also, ow.”

“Ah!” I loosened my grip when I realised what I’d been doing — digging my fingers into Eileen’s collarbone, gripping as hard as I could. “S-sorry. Sorry!”

Raine lowered her machete. “Alright, Heather. It’s alright. Can you talk to yourself without being abusive, now?”

Lonely Me just stared at the floor, defeated and dead. I stared down at her and tired not to feel disgusted.

“I still need to understand,” I said. “How can that be survivor’s guilt?”

Lonely Heather sniffed loudly, sniffing back her tears. “Will you believe me, if I explain? Or will you deny it again?”

“If you tell the truth.”

She laughed — a single hollow choking sound. “You hate me so much.”

“I— I don’t,” I lied. “I don’t hate myself, I ... just ... it’s always been hard, looking in the mirror, and ... and seeing ... ”

Lonely Heather raised her eyes. Her head of greasy, matted, mousey hair was framed by the vast eyeball behind the cracked glass. My words stuck in my throat.

“Seeing Maisie,” she finished for me.

“Well ... well, yes.” I sighed. “My own face is a constant reminder of what we lost. How could it not be? We were — we are — identical twins.”

“A reminder of what we lost,” echoed Lonely Me. “You’re so close.”

“Just ... just explain. Help me to understand.”

“How can you understand?” she asked, her voice so full of bitter venom and tears. “You’re up there, lording it over me, carried on ... on ‘her’ back. Being carried by the thing that did this to us. You’re surrounded by your friends. You’ve got all the support in the world, and I only have—”

“You have it too, Heathy!” Lozzie chirped. “We’re all here for you, too! You’re Heather! You’re you! You you you!”

Broken Heather stared at Lozzie for a moment, but then she looked down, her face collapsing into self-loathing and loss. “No, I don’t. All I have is myself. All I can rely on is myself. If you want to understand, then you need to come down to my level, Heather. Get off the Eye’s back. Come down here. On the floor. Where we belong.”

“We do not ‘belong on the floor’,” I tutted. “You hate yourself too, listen to yourself.”

Evelyn cleared her throat. “I do not think it is a good idea to set Heather down, in any case. She is still wounded, even if she’s not showing it, she ... ”

Evelyn trailed off as Seven-Shades-of-Sunlight put a finger to her own lips.

“Do not forget,” murmured the Yellow Princess, “that we stand on a stage. The spotlight lies upon Heather. The scenery reflects the turmoil of her heart. This room, the aquarium, the glass, all of it is her insides. We are merely interjections in this conversation with herself. Do not attempt to dictate. The script will buck us off, if we dare to disrupt.”

Evelyn hissed, “Yes, fine, but what about the giant fucking sea-monster?”

“That is Heather, too.”

Lonely Heather and I both glanced at my friends as they spoke, but then returned our gazes to each other, like magnetic fields pulled together.

“Look,” I said. “Rather than me joining you down there, you should join me up here. Let ... um ... let Raine take your hand and lift you up.” I sighed, disgusted by the idea, but I had to try. “You don’t have to be down there.”

“You’re lying.”

“Ah?”

Lonely Me sighed. “Maybe we’re not so different after all. You think it, the same as I do. We belong on the floor. We don’t deserve to stand.”

My turn to sigh. “I’m not going to pretend I like you. Just hearing your voice, it makes me angry, it makes me ... want to ... snap at you. But you’re me, fine, I accept that, or I’m trying to. And I’m pretty sure I won’t wallow in sadness, not when rescuing Maisie is so very close.”

“You will.”

I sighed again, temper fraying. “What does that mean?”

Lonely Heather paused for a long, long moment. Then she sighed and closed her eyes. “I tried to stop this. I tried as hard as I could. Don’t say I didn’t warn you, Heather. You’re getting what you asked for.”

“Warn me about what? I can hardly take a warning seriously if you won’t explain!”

Lonely Heather opened her eyes — suddenly calm and serene, desolate as stagnant water in a shell crater. “Do you remember what happened in Wonderland ten years ago, when we lost Maisie?”

A fist of ice grabbed my heart. “I ... o-of course I do. Of course I remember losing Maisie, I remember all of it, I wish I—”

“Because I didn’t,” said Lonely Heather. “I did not remember all the details.”

“But I do—”

“No,” she said. “You remember the physical details. You remember crawling through that portal beneath our bed, as if our limbs were compelled. You remember the taste of ash, the smell of burnt stone, the sight of all those titans at the rim. You remember screaming, our screaming, Maisie’s screaming. You remember trying to turn back, and finding that the portal was suddenly a hundred miles away, like the landscape was playing a trick on us. You remember the monsters, the misshapen things in the ruins. You remember scrabbling around in the black, breaking our nails and bloodying our hands on the jagged, scorched rocks, desperate for somewhere to hide. You remember clinging together with Maisie, weeping, screaming for mum or dad to come find us. You remember the way we whispered to each other, trying to keep each other’s spirits up. You remember the things that drifted through the ruins, the things that came and went, the things we could not comprehend, not as small children lost beyond reality. And you remember the Eye. You remember as it began to open—”

“Yes!” I snapped, shaking inside. I hiccuped once, so hard my throat hurt. “Yes, I— of course I remember that, of course I— why are you repeating all this—”

“But you don’t remember how we escaped,” said Lonely, Bitter, Knowledgeable me. “I know that, because I didn’t remember it either. Not until I listened to her.”

“ ... to who?”

“WE LEFT HER BEHIND.”

The voice which answered my question was a nightmare from the deepest, darkest, blackest corner of illimitable eternity — low and slow, a rumbling murmur like a current creeping along an ocean trench. The little steel room shook with the vibration of that voice; little trickles of water pulsed out from the cracks in the glass, while the cracks themselves lengthened and widened, spider-webbing outward. Half my friends gasped; somebody screamed. Zheng started to growl, then stopped, cowed in a way I had never heard from her before. Twil tucked her tail between her legs and whined. Six Abyssal Heathers froze where they stood, tentacles stilled.

Lonely Me closed her eyes, crying slow and silent tears.

“Traitor,” hissed the voice of a drowned giant. “Weakling. Coward.”

All the breath was gone from my lungs. My flesh was numb and empty. My thoughts were ash and rot.

Survivor’s Guilt moved behind the glass — she swam upward, her eye vanishing beyond sight, replaced first by the sharp sweep of a jagged jaw, then metre after metre after metre of abyssal flesh, of night-dark scales and peach-fuzz fur, of lashing tendrils and tentacles by the thousand, trailing great membranes of inky darkness behind her. Her legs were a dozen, branching and strong, tipped by webbed flippers and claws as long as my own body.

She swam upward, up beyond the little steel room. Then she returned from below, the glass wall framing her opposite eye.

She stopped, hung in the water before us, and said: “Tell her.”

Lonely Heather opened her eyes, still crying slow tears, and said, “We left her behind. We left Maisie behind.”

“We—” I almost choked on the word. “We did, yes. I felt that too, I know that. But it wasn’t our fault. We were nine years old, we were a child, how can we blame ... ”

Lonely Heather raised her right hand, still clenched in a tight fist. Blood had dried between her fingers and upon her knuckles. She opened the fist with great difficulty, easing back fingers which had been squeezing tight for hours and hours. She winced and hissed at the pain, fingers trembling with effort. Raine moved forward to help, to cradle her, to offer comfort, but Lonely Heather hissed at her with frustrated spite.

A trembling hand opened before me, palm up.

And there lay the pebble, slick with my blood.

“When ... ” Lonely Heather started, voice raw. She swallowed and tried again. “When the Eye began to open, we and Maisie, we were clinging together, huddled in the burned out ruins of some ancient building. We said things to each other, but the words don’t matter now. What mattered was the idea.”

My heart felt as if it had been dipped in ice. “The idea?”

“Mm.” Lonely me nodded. “We had an idea. See, when you’re trapped beneath the Eye, being taken apart piece by piece, burned out atom by atom, you can still think. You can still plan. Thoughts take eternities, but they do happen. So, we and Maisie, we had this idea. How do you get an Eye to close?”

I stared at that blood-slick pebble on her — my — palm.

“A speck of grit,” I whispered.

Lonely Heather nodded. She swallowed, dry and hard. “A speck of grit. A grain of sand. It’s enough to make an eyeball blink, isn’t it? I think we ... Maisie and us, I mean, I think we got it from a cartoon, some children’s show we can’t recall now. Maybe something we’d seen a couple of weeks or months before. Sand in the eyes. A speck of grit against the cornea. But here’s the rub — one of us had to become that speck of grit.”

“Never,” I hissed. “I would never. I would never have sacrificed Maisie just to get away. That’s a lie! That has to be a lie!”

“You didn’t,” said Lonely Heather. She was crying freely now — not sobbing, just red-eyed and wet-cheeked, tears rolling down her face to drip from her chin. “We didn’t. Of course we didn’t. We couldn’t have lived with that. No, we came up with the idea together, we and Maisie. And you — us — we were going to do it, to let Maisie get away. We were going to make ourselves into that speck of grit, so the Eye would blink, and Maisie could get away.”

The memory began to come back, leaking in like poison at the edges of my consciousness. I started to shake, clinging to Eileen’s shoulders with all my fading strength. I felt a wave of terrible nausea. I felt hot and cold both at once. My chest ached like my heart would burst.

“But we—”

“We were so scared,” said Lonely Heather. “We were terrified. Who wouldn’t be? We were nine years old. We didn’t know— we didn’t want to— didn't want to—”

“To die,” I said, filling in where this other part of me could not.
“We didn't want to die. But then—”

“We hesitated,” she said. “Just for a split second. We would have done it in the next.”

“But then, Maisie—”

“—went—”

“—first.”

“WE FAILED HER,” murmured that great and terrible beast, that hidden truth, Survivor's Guilt. “COWARD. WEAKLING. TRAITOR.”

The knowledge was like ice covering all my organs. I felt my innards slow, my brain darken, my eyes fill with tears, my throat close up.

Part of me wanted to die. Perhaps it had already.

I must have muttered ‘put me down’, because a moment later Eileen did exactly that. She squatted at my command, lowering me until my feet touched the floor. I let go of her, staggering free from the grip of my surrogate mother. The Praem Plushie was still tucked inside my yellow blanket, so I plucked her free and pressed her into Eileen's hands, ignoring all protests to the contrary. My friends reached out to touch me as I lurched forward, hands brushing my arms and flanks and ribs; even the Abyssal Heathers joined in, allowing contact at last, giving me a taste of the recombination I had desired so much.

But I felt nothing. I deserved none of those touches, none of that support, none of that love. I felt empty and pointless. The creaking pain in my ribs was gone, because the Survivor's Guilt was right here now, right in front of me. What need did it have to burst free, when I had finally acknowledged it? The pain in my leg returned, overwhelming the final dregs of morphine in my bloodstream. My gut, my head, my whole body was a bruise, a mirror of my soul.

I collapsed to my knees, facing my Lonely Self, so barely two feet separated us from each other.

“That's how we got away,” she was saying. “Maisie sacrificed herself for us. She bought our life, bought us ten years of grace, by spending her own. And we didn't ask her. We didn't push her. We didn't betray—"

"YES WE DID."

Survivor's Guilt blotted out all thought, shaking the little steel room with her bubbling murmur, louder than any sound on Earth. Lonely Heather winced and quivered, as if beneath the fist of a giant. I gasped in shock, looking up at that one huge eyeball which filled the spider-webbed glass wall.

My words felt like dust. "Why could I never remember this before now?"

"Because," said Lonely Heather. "We locked it away. We buried it deep. Because it's so very small." She gestured with her bloodied palm, cradling the pebble in her wounded flesh. "Such a small detail, isn't it? Just one tiny detail of how we got away and Maisie did not. Half the screaming, when we returned, that very night she was taken, it was about that knowledge, the knowledge that Maisie flung herself into the Eye, for us."

I shook my head, barely able to see through the tears. "How? How could I ever forget such a—"

"The treatment," said Lonely Me. "The doctors and the nurses. The drugs, even if they didn't work. The therapy, the hospitals. Cygnet." Her voice dripped with venom as she spoke the name of this place. "The treatment worked, Heather, even if it was for the wrong things. It 'healed' us, by letting us lock the guilt away."

Behind Lonely Heather, the Guilt shifted in her vast tank of water.

"But it grew," she hissed. "Down here in the dark. When this dream was woven, it joined Maisie in the prison, in the Box, because that's where it knows it should be. Punished and imprisoned, alongside our twin."

A hot, wet, ragged sob seized my throat. "This is ... this is what it feels like? When somebody sacrifices themselves for you?"

"Yes." She sobbed too. "Yes. We left her behind."

"I don't— I don't want this! I never would have asked her for this, I never—"

"WE LEFT HER BEHIND."

I clamped my eyes shut and fought the tears; there had to be something onto which I could grasp. “But— no, wait, no, no. We didn’t do anything! We didn’t push her, you said it yourself, it was just a moment of hesitation.”

“Yes,” said Desolate And Empty Me. “That was all it took, less than a second of hesitation.”

“By a nine year old girl!” I almost screamed. “I was — we were a child! Nine! We couldn’t have— we can’t blame ourselves for that! We can’t! It doesn’t make any sense, it’s irrational, it’s—”

THUMP.

Survivor’s Guilt shook the little steel room. The cracks in the glass spread wider. Little trickles of water gushed forth. My words choked off.

“That’s why they call it survivor’s guilt,” said Lonely Heather. “It doesn’t have to be rational. We survived, but did we really deserve to? Why us, and not Maisie? Why did we deserve to survive, when she didn’t? Did we hesitate because our desire to live was more powerful than our love for our sister? Would we do it differently, if we could turn back time and—”

“Yes!” I yelled. “Yes, yes, yes, a thousand times, yes! If I had to do it all again, I would do it differently, I would take her place, I would, I would!”

Lonely Heather managed to smile, a tiny broken flutter through her mask of tears. “That just gives it more power. We left her behind, Heather. We left her behind. We left her behind!”

Survivor’s Guilt pressed the orbit of her eye against the glass. Tiny cracking sounds filled the room. Water seeped and squeezed from the network of fractures.

“Yes,” I said, “we did. But now we’re here to rescue her.”

Lonely Me smiled all the harder. “You’re still clinging to that?”

I shook my head. “We don’t deserve this,” I hissed. “We don’t. We can’t keep hurting ourselves over it. That doesn’t get us any closer to Maisie. It doesn’t. We are here for one reason. To bring her home.”

Lonely Me, Desolate Me, Abandoned Me, she started to sob and wail, wracked by all the guilt I had kept locked up for so very long.

I fought one of the greatest battles of my life, compressed into a single moment — I stared into the face I found so vile and wretched, so ugly and full of hate, my own face, twisted by guilt and anger and the darkest of my own impulses.

All I was doing was looking into a mirror.

I reached out with one hand, to her, to touch—

Survivor's Guilt thrashed and raged behind the glass, shaking the little steel room like a cork in a storm. The floor and walls vibrated with the leviathan's fury, shuddering and drumming beneath the giant's fists.

The rage went on and on. Just when I thought this was it, this was the end, and she would shatter the glass asunder, she began to subside. The shaking trailed off. Survivor's Guilt pressed her eye back to the glass, bulging with anger.

All my friends stayed silent, frozen in shock.

Lonely Heather hissed, "Don't touch me!"

"But— why—"

"Because there is somebody here who should feel guilty, somebody who deserves all of this." Lonely Heather raised her free hand and pointed past my shoulder. "Her."

I did not need to glance over my shoulder to know that Lonely Heather was pointing at Eileen. But I looked anyway, behind myself, into the pink dawn-glow of Eileen's gaze.

Eileen said: "I did not know this was here. I could not see inside this part of myself. Something was hiding! I did not know. I am sorry, Heather."

"You see?" I asked, turning back to Lonely Heather. "How can she —"

"She was responsible for all this in the first place!" Lonely Heather spat at me. "She did this! She dragged us to Wonderland, she kidnapped us, she—"

"That's not true," I said, shaking my head, surprised by my own calm. "We know that's not true. A person did this, a human being, a mage we've never even met. You were there, you heard Taika's story just as well as I did. A human mage did this. By accident, by chance, without knowing what was happening. It could have happened to any other pair of twins, not us and Maisie. Luck of the draw. Random chance. Eileen didn't even know what was happening, she wasn't capable of understanding, let alone doing anything differently. She never intended any of this. She never intended anything! That doesn't mean the damage wasn't real, but ... all this was a mistake. You know that as well as I do. Stop lying to yourself."

Lonely Heather opened her mouth as if to continue the argument, then closed her mouth and fell silent.

"See?" I pressed on, feeling a surge of confidence. Maybe there really was another way out of this internal war. "You know she wasn't truly to blame. You know she's not some evil cackling villain. You can't keep up that fiction when she's standing right there, helping me, helping you, helping to rescue Maisie!"

Lonely Me raised her eyes — hollow, empty, defeated. "You're right. You're more right than you understand, she did not intend any of this. But you won't like the place that leads us."

"Then tell me!"

Lonely Heather raised the pebble again. "What does a speck of grit become, trapped inside soft tissue?"

"I— I don't follow—"

"Sealed off from everything else, locked away from the world, wrapped in layers of protection. The Eye doesn't keep people trapped, Heather. It never even understood concepts like that, I know that full well, yes. And ... Eileen, up there, do you think she has the ruthlessness to keep a person imprisoned, to deny them freedom, to make the world forget all about them?" Lonely Heather shook her head. "No. That wasn't her. That was all Maisie. She made herself into grit."

I raised my eyes to the interior of the little steel room — the Box, the walls, the high-tech prison. Maisie was at the core, trapped within so many layers of metal and liquid and concrete and brick.

"... a pearl," I whispered.

Lonely Me nodded, "A pearl, formed around a spec of grit. In reality it was not a physical process, of course, it was metaphysical. Her soul was grit. The pearl is metaphysics. The Box was just the best possible metaphor for it. A place within the Eye, full of things that it could not expel, dangers, toxins, irritants. And that's what Maisie made herself into, something the Eye could not expel. Something it had to encase. Maisie did that, for us."

"And this is why the world forgot her? All this time? This is why?"

"She edited reality. Not the Eye. And she did it for us."

"And—"

"And Survivor's Guilt has joined her, because that's where we should be. It should always have been us, not her. That's where we should be. In the Box. Forgotten."

I shook my head. "No. No. We can free her now! That's what I'm trying to tell you! We've already won, we—"

THUMP went the leviathan behind the glass.

Lonely Heather just stared at me, framed against the giant eyeball of Survivor's Guilt.

"Eileen still has to die," she said.

I almost laughed; instead I hiccuped. "But why?"

Lonely Heather's mask of tears cracked; she pulled a sad smile, trembling with agony and loss.

"This is what I was trying to protect you from, Heather," she said. "I wanted to make it so that you would never have to learn about the survivor's guilt. I was going to kill Eileen, take all the responsibility upon myself, accept all the blame, the hatred, the scorn, the rejection. Maisie would be freed! And you could blame me, you could heap your recrimination upon me. You could kill me, imprison me, forget all about me, it wouldn't have mattered—"

"You matter! I matter!"

"—and her?" Lonely Heather gestured over her shoulder, at the eyeball on the other side of the glass. "She would have been satisfied with that, with Eileen's death. How do you think she feels about Eileen?! Hmm?! How do you think she feels about our new surrogate mother? You think she believes we deserve that happiness? Of course we don't!"

“Eileen has nothing to do with it! Why would killing her free Maisie?”

“If she dies, the Survivor’s Guilt, it ... it would change. It would become something else. And then it would be on our side.”

“Revenge?”

“Probably.” Lonely Heather shrugged. “All I know is that we need it, we need her. We need every part of ourselves. We need it’s help, to free Maisie.”

I glanced at the glass, at the darkly beautiful leviathan in the vast tank of water. “Why? Can’t we just crack open the Box now? We’re here, we’ve won! Nobody has to die, there’s no need for revenge, there’s no need for any of this!”

Lonely Me shook her head. “The Box — the pearl — it’s so much deeper than what you can see here. Oceans of water, endless seas stretching down into an abyss. She told me about it, you see. The Survivor’s Guilt, she told me all about it, those fathomless black depths that go down forever. We could crack open this glass and it would take decades for the water to empty. It would drown the dream, and all of us with it.” Lonely Heather finally looked over her shoulder, at the dark eye behind the glass. “She is the only thing which can dive that deep and survive. She is the only part of us who can make it and live. And she wants revenge.”

I shook my head, numb and distant. “Then the only thing keeping Maisie imprisoned now is—”

“Us.” Lonely Heather turned back to me, eyes like used up coals.

“Yes. You, actually. You have to kill Eileen. You have to take revenge. You have to give up that connection, that contact, that happiness. Because we don’t deserve it.”

“Deserving has nothing to do with it!” I hissed. “I won’t kill—”

“You will. We’re both ruthless, Heather. We’re all ruthless. You thought that was just me. To be fair, I thought it was just me, too. But I was so very wrong. She’s ruthless, too, and she wants revenge. You’re ruthless as well, and you want to rescue Maisie. All I wanted to do was protect you, but I’ve failed. Do you want to know the real difference between you and I?”

“No, no—”

“You still think you can be a hero. I know that we can’t.”

All around me, the dream seemed to slow down, to go grey and cold and empty. The dream reflected my insides. And now I was hollow.

“Survivor’s Guilt has to be placated. Revenge is the only way. Revenge, or our death. And our death won’t bring Maisie back.”

Lonely Me was right. This dream did not have a happy ending, because I wasn’t a hero.

I was nothing.

I was dead.

A terrible cold certainty came over me.

With a neck made of rusty wire and eyes made of dead stars, I turned and looked over my shoulder, at Eileen.

She said nothing in return. My surrogate mother, the mother I always wanted, she just held my gaze — without judgement, without accusation, without fear.

All my friends looked on, and nobody said a word, because this was not their dream. Mouths stopped up by the inevitable script, morality and better angels held back by the logic of a dream.

Six Abyssal Heathers unsheathed their claws, moving to flank Eileen from both sides. Void-dark eyes narrowed. Toothy jaws opened with soft hissing.

I was no hero.

I was a traitor, a coward, and a weakling. The part of me which thought I could be a hero was dead now, and all the parts of me were finally in agreement.

I would do anything to rescue Maisie. I had promised myself that, long ago. And if that meant accepting the guilt for a murder, then I would become any kind of monster, any kind of traitor, any kind of evil. This way we would share the guilt together, forever. This way, Lonely Me would see where her philosophy ended. This way the Survivor’s Guilt would have to watch it happen. This way they would know that I was right all along, I was right, I was nothing, and we would all roil in our ugliness together and hate ourselves for the rest of our short and pitiful—

Eileen opened her mouth, clutching the Praem Plushie to her chest.

“It’s okay,” she said. “Whatever you choose, it’s okay, Heather. But please, when the dream is over, if I am gone, please love yourself.”

I vomited.

Not much — just a string of sticky bile laced with a bit of blood. But I hacked and coughed and heaved and spluttered, as if I had just burst from the surface of a sea of filth. I sucked down deep breaths of clean air, even if it reeked of brackish waters and the stench of rotten guilt.

The Six Abyssal Heathers paused. They felt the change, too.

I turned back to Lonely Heather, with drool hanging from my lips and the taste of vomit in my mouth.

“I’m no hero,” I croaked. “But I know what I am.”

“You can’t!” she hissed. “You can’t resist the Survivor’s Guilt. Look at how big she is. Look how she’s grown. If she won’t help us rescue Maisie, we can’t do it alone! If she breaks free, she’ll kill us all, long before we have any hope of reaching the centre of the aquarium. The water will drown us all, the dream itself will drown. You can’t deny this, Heather. You can’t!”

“I trust Maisie,” I said. “I trust Maisie.”

Lonely Me blinked. So did the Survivor’s Guilt, with a giant eyelid behind the glass.

“W-what?” Lonely Heather stammered. “I don’t—”

“Maisie told me to bring my friends,” I said, wiping the spittle from my lips on my sleeve. “And I have done exactly that. For a very long time, I didn’t know what difference that would make. I didn’t know why she told me to do that. But now, I think I understand. I think she knew this would happen, this splitting of ourselves. She knew that I would feel survivor’s guilt. She knew it would grow. And she gave me the weapon to fight it.”

Lonely Me shook her head. “What does that have to do with—”

“I hate you,” I said — without any hate. “When I look at your face, I feel disgust, and anger, and loathing. You’re so ... irritating, and misguided, and ... and just plain stupid. But also you’re me. I hate myself. I loathe what we did, leaving Maisie behind, even if it wasn't our fault, even if we were nine, even if no rational person would ever blame us. And that's the result." I pointed at the glass wall, at the Survivor's Guilt. "But ... but ..." I stared to tear up again. "How can I hate myself, when I see the way Raine looks at you?"

I glanced up at Raine. She was frozen as if afraid to speak.

"How can I hate you?" I repeated, back to Myself again. "When I saw the way every one of my friends rushed to your aid? Evelyn was worried by the tone in your voice over the radio. Lozzie thought you might be hurt. Twil acted like she did when we first met, walking into some dark, terrible place which had nothing to do with her, just to see if you needed help. Zheng, Sevens, Tenny. Even Jan, and we barely know her, by comparison. The Knights. The Cattys. All of them! Even Evee's grandmother, a fox with the brain of a mage! So many people, all bent toward helping me — helping you, us."

Lonely Heather's voice shook. "Where are you going with this?"

My turn to smile. To smile at my own face, which I hated, because it was Maisie's face, the face of the sister I felt I had betrayed.

"You and I, we're not actually any different. The self-loathing, the self-sacrifice — I see that now. Maybe I had to come here and see it, to understand. Maybe that was the only way. You and I are the same. We deserve the same things."

"No," she hissed. "No, don't—"

"We do not deserve to be alone anymore. We do not deserve to face this alone. We do not deserve—"

"We deserve to rot!" she screamed at me, all those tears and that loathing curdling into boiling rage. "We deserve to watch Eileen die, by our hands! We deserve—"

"Stop," I said.

And She stopped. Something in my voice stopped up all my self-hatred, if only for a moment.

"I want to throttle you," I said, and I meant it. Even as I spoke the words, I felt my hands twitch with the desire to wrap them around my own throat and squeeze as hard as I could. "I want to give you what you've asked for. Revenge. I want you to see what it would feel like, what it would do to you. I want to rub your nose in it. I want to hurt you, by hurting myself.”

“Then—”

“But none of that helps Maisie!” I shouted in my own face. “None of this will free her! You think going to war with myself will free our sister?! You think revenge is strong enough to swim down to the bottom of an ocean?!”

THUMP

The little steel room shook all around us. Survivor’s Guilt slammed against the glass, spreading the cracks wider, forcing little pulses of water through the hairline fractures. Lonely Me screamed.

But I staggered to my feet.

A dozen hands reached out to steady me, from all directions. My legs wanted to give out, my belly was on fire, and I was shivering like a leaf. But my friends held me up. They sustained me, where I could not sustain myself.

SLAM—SLAM—SLAM

“And you!” I roared the glass, unable to hear my own voice over the banging and crashing. “You can shut up! Shut up! Shut up!”

The slamming trailed off. Survivor’s Guilt eased away from the glass, so I could see the rim of her other gigantic eye, her face — my face! — sinking into the murk.

“You’re wrong,” I hissed at her — at myself. “I know I can prove you wrong. But you don’t want to let me. You’ll use violence before you listen to my words.”

Lonely Me, still huddled down on the floor, shook her head. “Heather, Heather, stop. Just stop. All this is hopeless. You’re hopeless, you’re a lie, we’re filth, what can we possibly—”

“I may not be a hero,” I admitted, “but that doesn’t matter. One of the most important lessons I’ve ever learned, and it’s still true.”

“ ... wait, what—”

“We are what we pretend to be. And I am going to pretend that I am capable of love.”

Lonely Heather scrambled to her feet, eyes wide with fear, trying to back away. She slipped in the puddle of cold water spreading out at the base of the glass wall, almost losing her footing as she staggered back from me.

“No!” she snapped. “No, you can’t, you can’t—”

Gently, I pulled free of my friends’ hands; six sets of tentacles took their place, six Abyssal Heathers holding me up at last, their will combined with mine, our minds as one.

I took a lurching step toward the Lonely, Sad, Hateful part of me.

“I’m going to do it,” I said. “And you can’t stop me.”

“No!” she wailed. She glanced back at the Survivor’s Guilt inside the tank. “She’ll get free! Heather, she’ll get free! She’ll kill us all! We can’t!”

Another lurching step. I spread my arms, trying to feel like a swift and graceful predator again; my Abyssal Selves held my wrists aloft, lending me their strength.

“I don’t care,” I said.

Behind Lonely Me, a giant webbed hand rose to the glass, each finger tipped with a massive black claw. Survivor’s Guilt pressed her paw against the wall and started to push. Cracking sounds filled the room. The glass, so many feet thick, began to bulge.

“Everyone will drown! The dream will drown!” Lonely Me wailed. She tried to back up again, but there was nothing behind her but the buckling glass. She flinched from that contact, then whirled to face me, a cornered animal before the flood.

“No,” I said. “No, they won’t.” Then I swung my head from side to side, taking in all the others in the little steel room. “Um, everyone needs to be ready to run away? Okay?”

That warning seemed to reanimate my friends, as if the stage spotlight had finally widened beyond myself and I.

Raine shouted: “We’re ready, Heather! You do it! You do what you gotta do!”

“You best know what you’re fucking doing!” Evelyn snapped as Praem scooped her up out of the wheelchair and into a princess carry. Twil ducked in and grabbed the chair itself.

“Do it, Shaman,” Zheng rumbled. “We can outrun any guilt.”

“Yip-yap!” went the Saye Fox.

Lozzie whooped. Jan stayed silent. Seven-Shades-of-Sunlight merely lifted her umbrella tip from the floor, ready to move.

Eileen said: “I am ready to carry you, as I always was.”

Lonely Me was trying to cram herself against the glass, as if I held a poisoned dagger to her throat. She was panting, covered in sweat, cringing away from me. “No. No, no, we don’t deserve—”

“I should have done this a long time ago. I’m so sorry.”

“No!”

I pounced.

That was how it felt, at least — a pounce, a leap through the air, landing on my prey with outstretched claws and snapping jaws. In truth what I did was lurch forward, supported by the tentacles of my Abyssal Selves, to blunder face-first into Lonely Little Me.

I caught Myself in a hug.

She — I! Me! — wailed as we bumped into the cracking glass together and slid down to the floor. We landed all tangled up in the cold, wet, brackish puddle of water. She pushed and shoved and writhed and bucked, wriggling like a weasel trying to escape my grasp. She smeared blood on my face and chin as she slapped and clawed in desperation. She fought with all the same determination I always did, and she fought well.

But I held on tight, squeezing her with all the might I had left to muster.

“Get off!” she wailed through her choking sobs. “Get off! Get off me! Get off!”

“Never,” I growled into her shoulder. “Never!”

We rolled through the widening puddle; above us, the glass buckled inward, cracking and splitting, spilling cold water into the little steel room. I was so bruised, so wounded, so tired that each impact felt like the end of the world, blacking me out for micro-seconds of unconsciousness. But the six Abyssal Heathers forced me to keep going, to keep my word, to keep myself within my embrace.

Eventually Lonely Heather gave up and gave out, her struggles trailing off. Sobbing and broken, pinned beneath my fading strength, her arms finally clawed at my back — a kind of hug.

“You can’t—” she sobbed, so very ugly with tears and blood and spite on her face. “You can’t mean this. You can’t. You can’t. Not with all the guilt, all the—”

I kissed her — the worst kiss I had ever participated in. I mashed my lips against her own, rough and hard and desperate. I tasted blood. Our teeth clacked. She moaned into my mouth with pain and tears and a horrid wet sob, clutching at my back with fingernails like claws.

When I pulled away, she was weeping.

“I love you,” I said.

“No.”

“I love you, I love you, I love you, I love you—”

“Stop it,” she sobbed, all her power drained away. She clung to my shoulders like a frightened child, whining and keening. She sobbed into my shoulder, biting at my collarbone. She blubbed and burred and tried to say all sorts of words, none of them with much sense.

“I love you,” I repeated.

“I ... I ... I-love you too,” she finally squeezed out. “But—”

Survivor’s Guilt reared away from the glass wall of the final aquarium. A titanic hand drew back through the murk. Webbed fingers closed up tight. Claws bit into her own palm, wounds trailing vast streamers of crimson blood through the water. She made a fist.

“She won’t let us love ourselves,” said Lonely Heather. “She won’t.”

Survivor’s Guilt threw a punch at the glass wall. Thousands of gallons of water parted before her fist. The onrushing pressure sent a spider web of cracks spreading across every inch of the glass, finally reaching the edges of the wall. Water burst forth in streams and spouts. The glass crackled and popped and screamed with tension, bulging outward, ready to burst.

The fist landed. The glass exploded.

bedlam boundary – 24.37

Survivor's Guilt — an abyssal leviathan who wore my face, who bore within her heart all my most furtive fears, whose void-dark eyes burned with the fires of my very own self-righteous rage — slammed a wrecking-ball fist into the weakened glass of her prison, breaking the watery bonds which held her at bay, parting the final barrier between us and Maisie.

Glass exploded inward, filling the little steel room with flying chunks of razor-edged debris; a tidal wave of bitter cold seawater crested above my head and that of my Lonely Counterpart, as we lay locked in our sobbing reconciliation. The reek of brackish water and dying fish-flesh and matted seaweed invaded my nostrils, coated my exposed skin with unclean air, and pulled fresh tears from my stinging eyes. The hooked claws of That Great And Terrible Guilt unfolded through the falling wall of water, unfurling from a palm which could crush me and myself and all my other facets with a flicker of one swift squeeze. Guilt reached out for us — for myself and my Lonely Half alike, who clung to me, screaming and sobbing for mercy; six Abyssal Heathers raised their barbed tentacles and opened their fanged maws, hissing a warning at the top of six identical lungs. But this Giant Of The Deep, she could not and would never heed any warning, because her cause was just and right, and we were all so very wrong and wretched.

A shadow of flesh and water descended, to crush us all beneath sheer weight of guilt. In the darkness of that death, I believed for just a moment that this was what I had deserved all along. Self-love fled in terror; acceptance curled up and went silent. I felt nothing in my arms, certainly not myself. My eyes began to close.

At least Maisie's prison was broken. At least that—

Strong hands hooked beneath my armpits, dragged me to my feet, and hauled me away from the brink.

Guilty Heather's giant fist snapped shut on empty air. Black claws raked across bare steel, their tips screaming like nails down a chalkboard. Pale fingers flailed, flexing for the fleeing prey.

And all about my ears were the voices of those who loved me.

“Oh shit, oh shit, oh shit!”

“Stop yapping! Just run! Run, now! Everybody out! Out that fucking door! And get Heather on her—”

“I’ve got her, I’ve got her! Eileen, you carry the other, you—”

“Hahahahahaaaaa! Shaman! We will fight as we once should have!”

“Somebody grab her, too! She can’t fistfight a giant!”

“I thought you said it was just Heather?!”

“Yes, and she’s furious — mostly with herself! We don’t want to get in the way! Run!”

Before I could protest, struggle, voice a complaint, or even comprehend what was happening, I found myself cradled in strong, protective, reliable arms, carried against a warm chest which felt like home. Eileen’s face was above me, pink eyes burning in the sudden dark; a familiar presence crawled into my yellow blanket — the Praem Plushie, telling me to hang on as tightly as I could. We were at the centre of a mad scrum of all my friends, as everybody rushed for the exit from that little steel room. Water sloshed around everybody’s ankles, flowing in a stuttering torrent from the shattered glass wall; the worst of the water pressure had been blocked, dammed up by the sudden stoppage of the Guilty Leviathan’s hand, still snapping and grasping for her prey denied.

Lonely Heather still clung to my own right hand, screaming and sobbing against our separation as we were pulled apart; for a terrible moment I thought my most beloved people in the world were leaving her behind, leaving behind a part of me, leaving her to drown in that awful steel prison. I think I screamed too, screaming out that I loved myself too much to let myself go — but then our hands parted, too slippery with sweat and blood and freezing cold water to maintain our grip. But then I realised with sobbing relief that Lonely Heather was being carried too, cradled in Raine’s arms.

“Out, out!” somebody shouted again — Twil, I thought, with the snarl and snap of too many teeth in her panicked snout. “Back the way we came! Double time!”

“You wouldn’t know double time if it hit you in the cu—”

“Just run, hey?! Argue later, like!”

Everyone bundled out of the little steel room, bursting out onto the metal walkway beyond; water was already trickling through the door, falling through the metal mesh holes on the walkway, plummeting into darkness. Seven-Shades-of-Sunlight paused by the door, counting off names as everybody fled, then ducking at the last second to scoop up a bundle of russet fur — the Saye Fox, not to be forgotten. Above us, Tenny's single black tentacle whipped through the air as if startled, tip-mouth opening wide, lined with tiny black teeth.

We — me and myself and all of I, and all the companions who had descended into this abyssal inferno alongside me — sprinted away into the darkness of the Box, our gang of footfalls ringing out into the drowning shadows.

I clawed my way up Eileen's shoulder. "No!" I wheezed. "No, I can't run, I have to face her! I have to face myself ... "

My complaint was rather premature.

Behind us, the glass of the aquarium shuddered, quivering like molten light beneath a beating star. A spout of solid water exploded from the doorway of the little steel room we had just fled, bursting free in a horizontal torrent, crashing down onto the walkways behind us, pouring a waterfall of icy brine into the depths below, splashing into the vast seas which already lay heavy and dark in the sump of the Box.

The aquarium glass shuddered a second time, ringing like a bell of lead and iron, a great gong vibrating all through the interior of the Box. Several of my friends winced and hissed as they ran. Zheng shook her head at the terrible noise. The Saye Fox whined. Twil barked.

The twin shadows of gigantic clawed hands thumped against the glass, moving slowly as if trapped in tar, framing a glass-blurred vision of my own gigantic face. Once, twice, three times she thumped on the weakening walls. Cracks the size of canyons spread across glass as thick as redwood trees, spider-webbing outward, filling the air with an artillery barrage of crack-crack-crack-crack!

The aquarium burst asunder.

I am convinced that if this had happened beyond the cushion of a dream, we would all have been struck deaf in an instant. The shock wave alone would have tossed us about like leaves before a hurricane. None of us would have made it a single additional step. This would have been the end.

But I — and me — was still grappling for control of the dream. And self-love reduced certain death to merely the loudest sound we had ever heard.

Chunks and spears and plates of glass the size of train cars flew into the air, raining down upon the cavernous innards of the Box like a shower of meteors, crashing into metal walls, crumpling the walkways either side of our fleeing group, smashing down into the deeper seas below to throw up huge plumes of water. Somebody screamed — perhaps myself, wild with panic and fear and worse.

Somebody else shouted, “Duck and cover, duck and cover!”

A third voice — Raine? — laughed with manic terror. “Are you fucking mad?!”

“It’s better than nothing, ain’t it!?”

Evelyn screamed, “Keep running, you imbecile!”

Tenny’s silken black tentacle whipped overhead, to provide the cover we could not. She smashed aside falling chunks of Guilt’s demolished prison, deflecting boulders of glass, catching them like tennis balls and hurling them back the way they came.

“Puppy!” Zheng roared.

Lozzie — her voice blurred by tears and panting lungs — howled a thank you as Tenny protected us.

A true tidal wave of water followed the eruption, exploding outward as the aquarium collapsed. Billions upon billions of gallons rose in a vast wall behind us, crashing down onto the walkways, swallowing the metal innards of the Box, devouring the corpses of Empty Guards, demolishing the dead automatic turrets, sweeping up a mountain of debris before the waters, drowning all the lesser seas over which we had passed. The former inhabitants of the Box — the hidden creatures of the deep who had breached their tanks and joined the seas — roared and squealed and lashed as the waves swept them forward, trapped in the chaos.

“You can’t do anything against that, Tenny!” Lozzie shouted. “Go back, go back outside for now! You’ve done so so so well, go back!”

We'll see you outdoors!"

A great throaty 'pbbbbb!' of distress echoed from beyond the Box, barely audible above the rage of the waters.

"Just keep running!" Evelyn roared from within Praem's arms, cradled in an awkward princess carry. "Keep running! Stop looking back, that's how it gets you!"

"How what gets you!?" Twil shouted. "You can't outrun a tidal wave! That's not how it works!"

"This is a dream, you mongrel! Keep going!"

Brackish rain began to fall — the leading edge of spray from the tidal wave. It began as mere spitting, turned within seconds to a steady pitter-patter, then burst upon us as a downpour of reeking seawater, drenching us all in Guilt's Accusation. Salty water stuck my hair to my scalp, sluiced my clothes to my skin, and ran in little rivulets into my mouth. It tasted like bitter tears and stagnant hatred, the rotten remains of a forgotten brew.

And at the centre of that crashing wave of water an abyssal goddess reared up, breaching the surface, clawing at the air — Heather The Leviathan.

Armoured in scales of midnight black and luxurious fur of peach-fuzz pink, with eyes the colour of the void between stars, her claws each longer than a great white shark, her vast mass propelled on a dozen flippered legs, body studded with hundreds of barbed tentacles, spined and spiked and bristling all over, she was the abyssal truth grown to titan proportions. Giant Heather — Guilty Heather, Heather The Murderous, Heather The Bitter, Heather The Vast And Terrible And Full Of Punishment — rode the crest of that tidal wave, pulling herself forward with each smooth swipe of her arms, crashing through the metal innards of the Box, reaching for us with the descent of her clawed fists.

We outpaced her by mere seconds, more by luck and chance and dream logic than natural speed — and by divine intervention, for Tenny had not left us behind at Lozzie's urging.

As Leviathan Heather ate up the walkway behind us, dragging twisted metal scrap down into the depths with her lashing tentacles, or biting into the metal with a vast and hungry maw full of silver teeth, she had to contend with a single silken black tentacle. Tenny, still reaching in from far beyond the Box, thwacked Guilty Heather in the forehead every time she threatened to gain on our little scurrying group. Every time Leviathan Me raised a clawed hand to cut off our escape, Tenny's tentacle was there to wrestle her away. Every time she reared up out of the waters to crash down upon us, Tenny's tentacle darted in to slap her across the face. Every time she opened her maw to roar us into submission, Tenny shoved her head back below the waters with a piston-slam of tentacled strength.

I howled over Eileen's shoulder, shouting at my Leviathan Self.

"Stop it!" I yelled. "Stop this! Stop, please! We're so close to Maisie, we almost had her free! All we have to do is go back, we can swim down there and free her! Why won't you stop!? I love you too, do you understand?! You're still part of me! Stop!"

Lonely Heather joined in, bawling and braying in Raine's arms. "Stop hurting Tenny! Stop it! Stop, stop!"

"We love you!" I hurled at her. "Even you, even the guilt! I love you, you don't have to do this!"

A voice rumbled from beneath the onrushing water, a voice from the abyss — "TRAITOR. WEAKLING. COWARD. WE LEFT HER BEHIND!"

"And we're leaving her behind right now!" I shouted at My Giant Self. "We're inches from getting her back! Who's the one betraying Maisie now!?"

Leviathan Heather raised her gargantuan face from the waters for but a moment, opened her maw, and hissed with a noise like the burble of a volcano.

Tenny slapped her across the mouth, loud, wet, and crunchy, breaking bones and pulping meat. She crashed back into the waters and resumed her submarine pursuit.

All around me, my friends fled before the crashing wave of my own Guilt. Eileen cradled me in her arms, no longer upon her back. Raine held the other me, comforting her sobbing, bloodstained face against her chest. Praem carried Eevee, Evelyn's eyes crammed shut with real fear. Twil was almost all werewolf now, using her wolfish strength to haul the less glamorous prize of Evelyn's wheelchair, holding it two handed above her own head. Zheng sprinted, her half-naked blood-streaked form washed clean here and there by the water, running in bloody tracks down her skin. Lizzie hopped and skipped and slid as if the fear was no impediment at all — but she clung to Jan's more clumsy hand, pulling along Jan's armour-encumbered frame. Seven-Shades-of-Swiftly-Striding had her shoes off and dangling from one hand, her umbrella over one shoulder, running barefoot, the Saye Fox cradled in the crook of her arm. The Forest Knight jogged almost at the rear, his joints lubricated and accelerated by the strange symbiosis of Mister Squiddy, with Maisie's destined new body still strapped to his back.

Six Abyssal Heathers raced to either side of myself and Lonely Heather, as if protecting and herding us, turning now and again to hiss and screech at the crashing giant of our own Guilt, flaring their tentacles and baring their teeth at this hundred-magnified mirror of their own abyssal beauty.

For one dizzying moment — as we raced across those ringing metal walkways, with the Box collapsing around us, the waters of the abyss rushing at our heels, and Tenny's single tentacle the only thing between us and the oblivion of a nightmare — I saw us all, from behind, from above.

I saw us — me and Myself, all my friends, Raine and Eileen carrying our opposite halves, surrounded by a phalanx of abyssal tentacles, racing ahead of inevitable doom. We were so very small, insignificant remnants clinging to a reality which could never be, trying to reverse history, to deny causality, to make a world where Maisie had never sacrificed herself.

I saw through giant's eyes, for just a moment. I saw us how she did — as irritating denials of what had come to pass, as those who needed punishing, as the last thread holding us back from well-deserved self-destruction.

There were so many of me — one and two and six and eight and nine.

Staring up at that crashing wave of water, staring out of the water down at myself, staring through a twinned pair of crying eyes, through six pairs of abyssal senses all around us. For one moment, I saw through them all, and they saw through me, and we were almost one again.

"Oh," I breathed to nobody in particular, for no ear could hear over the waters of Guilt. “Are we recombining? Are we—”

“No!” wailed Lonely Heather, and her lips were mine, my voice was her own, she took our vocal chords and screamed. “No, we can’t! She’ll kill us all, she’ll overwhelm us! There’s so much more of her than us! There’s so much of her! Stop!”

The Abyssal Heathers joined with a chorus of hissing — they agreed, the Guilt could not be allowed in, for it would devour them all, overwhelm their defences, and swallow me whole. The six hissing voices suggested victory over ourselves was the only way out. She must be beached, starved of water, dried out in the light of the Eye’s gaze, denied and deconstructed and left without a single way back in, for she was death and self-ruin and suicide. She must be killed.

Though I was only human, and my throat was but meat and gristle, and rather sore at that, I opened my mouth and hissed right back.

“No!” I screeched. “No! She’s part of me, she’s part of us, she’s us too! And I have to, I have to love her all the same, I have to, I have to—”

Another shout broke in from beyond this inter-Heather conversation — Twil, up front.

“I think we’re almost at the doors!” she yelled over the sound of the crashing water behind us. “We’re almost there!”

Jan yelled from inside her armour, “And what the hell do we do when we get out!? Run sideways?! What’s your plan?!”

Raine shouted, “Keep running, mostly! Clang clang clang, Jan! Keep clanging!”

Twil was correct. A few moments later a pinprick of silver-grey light floated up out of the shadow-wreathed metal ahead, surrounded by massive chunks of glass thrown clear from the exploded aquarium tank — the doorway. Huge gashes had been torn in the surface of the box by giant spears of broken glass, hanging in the dark like icebergs on a metal ocean. The great circular door frame rushed toward us as we sprinted down the final walkway, racing ahead of the crashing wave at our heels.

The door was partially blocked by jagged debris from the glass tank. Lozzie raised her voice in a shrill shout, “Tenny! Tenn-Tenns, get the door!”

Tenny obliged. We had long outpaced the single tentacle with which she had assisted and defended us from my own Raging Guilt, but now a fresh trio of silken black tendrils appeared around the edges of the door; huge black mouth-tips opened wide and swept aside the debris clogging our escape.

Lozzie whooped. “That’s my girl! That’s my Tenny!”

“Mine as well,” I whispered, filled with a pride I had never known before.

We burst free from the Box, stampeding back out into the grounds of Cygnet Asylum, beneath the grey daylight of the dream and the silver glow of the Eye which filled the sky. The subterranean darkness of the Box receded behind us, leaving me blinking against the sudden blinding light.

Nobody slowed down or stopped — none of us was foolish enough for that, the power of the dream extended only so far. Water was flowing out of the doorway already, sluicing around the sides of the fallen metal door, splashing down the concrete, flooding out onto the green lawns beyond, beginning to trickle into the trenches and craters of the mock battlefield. Footfalls splashed through the running stream, racing across the concrete, heading for open ground as quickly as we could all run.

The rest of our split party was waiting for us. The Twins — Zalu and Xiyu — stood in front, with Horror’s decapitated head clipped to one of their belts, now gaping wide at the sight of the torrent rushing behind us. All six of the Caterpillars had formed up into a protective wall, as if to receive and shelter us from a pursuing foe, with the thirty Knights ready at their collective rear. The remaining six of Lonely Heather’s Empty Guards stood with their hands bound, escorted by a pair of Knights, to make sure they behaved.

Tenny towered above it all, a vast moth-shape clad in velvet black and fluffy white, topped by twitching antennae and the iridescent flutter of her huge wings. She was already disengaging from the Box, unwinding her tentacles from where she had grasped it, her many legs backing away from the twisted metal wreckage and the trickles of water flowing from the many cracks and splits and breaches in the surface.

Xiyu was shouting, “What’s on your rear?! What’s at your rear? Orders! We need orders! Where’s all that water coming from, where —”

“Run!” Raine yelled. “Just run, get out of the way!”

“We can’t,” Xiyu snapped. “We need orders, we need—”

I wondered briefly if six full-grown Caterpillars would have been enough to stop Heather The Leviathan. Maybe, if everything else about the situation had been different. Maybe if they had six times that number. But not these vulnerable, half-restored Cattys; they could not fight that giant, no matter how loyal and stout their hearts. I would not see them swept aside and drowned by my own Guilt.

I twisted in Eileen’s arms as we passed through the phalanx of Knights and Caterpillars.

“It’s me!” I screamed in their faces. “It’s me! It’s all my guilt and hate and everything bad about me! Run, now!”

We flew through the cordon and burst out the other side. Zalu and Xiyu shared a look, then glanced in twinned unison at the way the gushing river of water from the doorway was beginning to lift the massive steel door from the ground. They broke and ran, joining us in our flight. The Knights hesitated all as one body, then turned and followed the Forest Knight too, dragging the Empty Guards after them. The Six Caterpillars let out soft little ‘doot-doot!’ sounds, closing ranks as if to buy us more time.

Behind us, the flow of water from the doorway turned into a gushing spout, a solid mass of liquid shooting forth and spraying out over the grounds of Cygnet. The concrete and metal walls of the Box creaked and groaned with pressure. A great thumping, cracking, banging sound rang out, shaking the mud and soil at our feet.

“Where do we fucking go!?” Twil yelled as we stumbled into the remains of the battlefield. “There’s no high ground or anything, there’s just the hospital rooftops, and there’s no way in from over here, there’s no—”

“Just keep going!” Raine called. “Keep running!”

Evelyn raised her head from Praem’s chest, hoarse with panic. “We can't keep running! We have to have a solution! Heather! This is your dream, how do we—"

"I don't—" I panted with the effort. "I don't know what to do! I don't know what to do! Love isn't— love isn't enough! She won't stop, she won't—"

"She's going to drown us all!" screamed my Lonely Counterpart. "She's here, she's here, she's all—"

Screeeeeeekt-crunch-krrrrrang!

The front wall of the Box buckled outward in a flower of metal and concrete, blossoming with bent girders and twisted pipes, bursting asunder under the pressure of two fists full of black claws and titanic muscle. An ocean of water cascaded from the breach, pouring from the Box and out into the dream, a deluge drowning concrete and grass and trenches and trees and light and dark alike. A wall of water splashed and sloshed forth, to smother reality beneath the waves.

Survivor's Guilt — The Terrible Leviathan Inside Myself — hauled her vast bulk through the breach in the Box, clawing at the ruined edges of the wound in the world, carried through on the tumult of gushing water. She snagged herself on spikes of metal and grazed her flesh on exposed concrete, uncaring of these wounds, adding pinkish froth to the braken seas. She slopped forth like a breaching whale, stumbling in the rushing murk; she strode out onto the surface of the dream, tides swirling around her dozen ankles. Her footfalls cracked the concrete and cratered the earth. She straightened up to her full height, taller than the Box itself, tall enough to scrape the air.

She raised her face to the sky, staring upward into the Eye, then opened her maw, each tooth as long as a human being.

Hissssssssss!

Her hiss split the heavens and made the ground tremble. The dream itself quaked at her arrival.

Eileen gasped as if struck; in the sky above, the Eye — her true body, vast beyond human scale, a crust of mountain-range lid-lip enclosing a silver sea wider than all the Earthly continents combined, a god of hyperdimensional mathematics, a leviathan in her own right, self-liberated and uplifted from the darkest reaches of the abyss — flinched.

A cliff-face of water bore down on us, stretching the width of Cygnet's grounds, sweeping up the discarded tanks and abandoned corpses from the mock battlefield, churning with the lethal debris from inside the box, studded here and there with darkened patches — the other leviathans from the deep places, struggling for their lives amid the cataclysm. We stumbled and lurched past waterlogged trenches, Raine shouting and urging us all on. But there was simply nowhere else to run. Behind us, the six Caterpillars stopped and turned, as if they planned to face the wave head-on.

We were all about to drown in the salt-water afterbirth of my own Guilt. And all I could do was stare upward at the most beautiful version of myself I had ever seen.

Despite all that she represented, the Leviathan Heather was an abyssal beauty to surpass all.

Standing at six stories tall, framed against the black ridges of the Eye, she was a true giant of the deeps. Her face was mine but sharper, so much more predatory and full of clarity, with none of the careworn lines of stress and exhaustion. Her eyes were the colour of interstellar nebula, pupiless and black and glittering in the light. Her hair was a flowing mass of quasi-fleshy tendrils, floating like seaweed in a placid current, as if she had brought the ocean abyss to the surface with her emergence. She possessed a mouth full of shark's teeth, muscles like butter, and all the grace of an oceanic predator, moving with fluid speed in the open air despite her incredible size. She was clad in both scales and fur, in the armour of midnight and the blush of dawn, streaked here and there with the gently strobing colours of rainbow bioluminescence, ghostly in the daylight, like a phantasm which refused to lie down at night's end. She was lined with hundreds of tentacles, each one barbed or spiked or with a fanged maw gnashing and snapping in the tip. Her belly was taut with muscle — something I had never experienced before — and her hips were skirted with flared plates of chitin. Her legs branched outward into a dozen separate limbs, each one multi-jointed, each one ending in a flippered talon, tipped with curling claws. Great ink-dark membranes hung from her shoulders like a cloak, or wings, or a sail with which to catch the hidden currents out in the black.

She was sublime, perfect, divine.

If only she could have understood how much I loved her.

As that wave crashed toward me and my friends, I could see no other way out. Our tiny little group was all stumbling to a halt — even Praem, even Lozzie, those who never seemed to give up, they too were turning in awestruck surrender, stilled by the certain knowledge that we could not outrun a true tidal wave, even in a dream. Raine stumbled to a halt and hugged Lonely Heather to her chest, kissing her hair, muttering words I could not hear; Lonely Heather clung to her in turn, weeping freely. Twil turned like a wolf at bay, showing all her teeth and claws, howling at our doom, fur bristling all over. Zheng stood tall, grinned wide, and raised her fists, ready to fight anything, even a wall of water. Jan slapped down the visor of her armour, grabbed Lozzie around the waist with one arm, and started making strange symbols with her other hand. Seven-Shades-of-Sunlight simply stopped, hugged the Saye Fox tight, and closed her eyes. Before us, the six Caterpillars dug their front ends into the wet soil, as if trying to anchor themselves, wiggling back and forth like little digging mammals.

“No!” I cried out. “No, we can still make it! We can— somehow— there has to be—”

Eileen murmured, “I will carry you until the end. Whatever that may be.”

“There doesn’t have to be an end!” I screamed. “There doesn’t— we don’t have to die here! This isn’t how it was supposed to—”

“Prrrrrrrrbbbbbbt-brrrrrrrrttttt!”

A giant of our own came splashing through the climbing waves.

At the very moment we began to accept that the dream would end as a nightmare, Tenny skidded up beside our ragged little group, her many insectoid legs hoisting her far above the limit of the crashing waters. Two dozen thick black tentacles writhed out from beneath the wings upon her back, then shot downward toward us like a cluster of guided missiles. Sticky black mouth-tips opened wide, then clamped shut on collars and shoulders and waists, plucking us upward one by one, wrapping supporting coils around those who wriggled or panicked or yelped in surprise. She grabbed Eileen by the scruff of her laboratory coat, Raine by her waist, and had Twil dangling upside down from both legs, growling and barking and yapping at the top of her lungs. Zheng roared with exhilaration, Jan squealed in surprise, while Lozzie whooped and cheered and cried with relief. Seven-Shades-of-Sunlight rode a tentacle up in perfect composure, the Fox cradled in her arms, and Evelyn crammed her eyes shut, still held in Praem's grip as we were all yanked off the ground and hurled into the air. The Knights clung to a single tentacle all together, hands linked in a long chain, like ants crawling across a moth's leg. Six Abyssal Heathers scrambled up Tenny's fur, accepting the tentacle-ride without so much as a hiss of mild surprise. Zalu and Xiyu held on together, Horror screaming in wordless terror.

My stomach lurched, left somewhere back on the ground, as Tenny lifted us all into the air. Wind whistled past my ears, my heart gave a terrible spasm of fear, and—

And Eileen's feet found solid ground — or at least sturdy concrete, followed swiftly by everybody else.

Tenny deposited us upon the top of Cygnet Asylum itself, on a nice flat rooftop, with lots of wide open space. Thirty Knights climbed off one tentacle, while my friends staggered and heaved for breath, wild-eyed with shock or composed as if they had expected nothing less. Twil fell onto her backside with a loud thump, swearing with guttural creativity. Praem bowed her head in thanks, while Sevens let the Fox down, to scamper across the rooftop. Lozzie hugged one tentacle with all her might. Zheng roared "Puppy!" at the top of her lungs. Jan turned aside, opened her visor, and vomited onto the floor. Evelyn blinked her eyes open, clutching Praem with hands like claws, staring about as if she couldn't believe we weren't all drowned.

Eileen looked up at Tenny's cat-like face, hovering above us, and said: "Thank you for the lift, granddaughter."

"Brrrrrrrrrrrrt!" went Tenny, smiling with that curled and cattish mouth, full of delight and mischief.

Far behind Tenny, framed by the twisted metal ruin of the Box, Leviathan Heather lowered her face from the Eye-wrought sky. A void-dark gaze stared at Tenny, with none of my affection.

"Hisssssssss!"

With the last of us safely on the rooftop, Tenny turned away, facing her opponent. “Brrrrrrrt!”

“Hisssssssssssssssssss!”

Survivor’s Guilt strode forward, wading through the rising water, raising one giant fist as if to smash the rooftop to pieces. Tenny scuttled out to meet her, trilling at the top of her lungs, waving a battery of silken black tentacles.

“Oh my gosh,” I whispered, heart leaping into my throat. “Oh my gosh, no, no, they’re going to fight, no!”

Lonely me screamed from Raine’s arms. “Don’t hurt Tenny! Don’t you dare hurt her! You bitch, you foul monster, I hate you, I hate —” “Tenns!” Lozzie shouted, hands cupped around her mouth.

“Remember to dodge! Light on your feet! Bounce bounce bounce! You can do it, you’re my girl!”

Twil shook her head like a wet dog — which she was, just then.

“You cannot be serious. This can’t be happening. Who the hell is in control of this part of the dream?!”

Jan sighed, wiping her lips on the back of a gauntlet. “I seem to recall the last surprise dream I got dragged into also ended with a kaiju fight.”

“But that’s Heather!” Evelyn shouted, gesturing wildly at Leviathan Me. “That is Heather! Look at her! That’s Heather!”

“Sure is,” muttered Raine. “And she sure is beautiful. Wish she’d listen to us, though.”

“Eileen,” I said, twisting around to look up into her face. “Take me to the edge, take me to the edge, I need to see!”

Eileen did as I asked; she carried me to the lip of the roof, where a low concrete wall rose to prevent accidental falls. Raine did the same, then gently placed Lonely Heather, my mirrored counterpart, back onto her shaking legs. Eileen lowered me gently beside her, so I and I clung together, our arms clutching each other, supporting each other’s body weight. Lonely Heather’s right fist was closed tightly around the pebble, which she still would not release. The six Abyssal Heathers drew close in turn, sliding stealthy tentacles around my waist, supporting my sagging muscles, soothing my bruises and my wounds and my sheer exhaustion; I hurt so badly I could barely stand, worn down to a stub by panic, by effort, by pain, by the dream itself. But within seconds I was locked in mutual support with my Lonely Half and the six expressions of my Tentacles. We were all here, all except her — the Guilt.

The others all followed too, clustering around, staring up at Tenny with wide eyes, or out across the flood with gaping mouths.

The grounds of Cygnet Asylum were rapidly drowning beneath an ocean of water, solid shafts of liquid pumping from the ruined shell of the Box as if from a burst dam. The trees of the little woodland were still above the surface, but not for long. The bottom floor of the hospital building itself was beneath the churning surface by then. In the distance, off to our collective right, the liberated patients and ex-nurses were running for higher ground, where the landscape curved upward into gentle hills; those hills would protect them for a few hours, but not if the water level kept rising. Down in the Box, that final aquarium had held more water than all the oceans of Earth. Lonely Me had not exaggerated — Guilt would drown the dream and kill us all.

Far below us, the six Caterpillars we had brought to Wonderland had apparently learned how to swim, bobbing and dipping on the surface of the crashing waters. They darted about like lifeboats, rolling on the waves, propelling themselves forward with some arcane power. They circled the many ankles of my Guilty Monster, shouting up at her with a chorus of angry doot-ing.

To my relief, The Guilty Leviathan ignored the Caterpillars; I could not have endured it if she had spared a fraction of her power to scoop them up and crush them within their shells. I would have cursed her to oblivion for that.

Instead, she did worse — she strode forward, hissing and spitting, and slammed into Tenny.

“Prrrrrrrrrrrbttttt!”

The pair of dream-titans crashed into each other, their ankles sunk in the churning waves, their tentacles slapping and lashing and cracking at the air. Guilty Heather bared her teeth in an ear-splitting hiss; Tenny raised her trilling so loud it shook the hospital building and made the water vibrate around her legs. Tentacles clashed and locked, struggling against each others’ strength. Guilt-

Ridden Me pulled back a fist—

“Don’t you dare hit her!” I screamed, red in the face. “She’s our daughter!”

The Guilty Leviathan hesitated — only for a heartbeat, but that was more than enough time for Tenny to lash out with a clutch of silken black tentacles. She grabbed Titan Heather by the wrist, stopping her punch and hauling her to one side, forcing her to stumble and stagger through the waves. Leviathan Heather hissed and screeched. Her other fist lashed out, unhindered by further hesitation. Tenny bobbed sideways with a moth-like grace, wings fluttering for lift, dodging the fist by what seemed like inches. She caught the offending strike in another clutch of black tentacles, holding Guilty Me by both fists.

Leviathan Heather screeched and hissed and raged in frustration, struggling against her fresh bonds.

“Prrrrbtttt-brrrrrt!” Tenny trilled in triumph.

From behind me, Jan sighed. “This is your fault, you know that, Heather?”

Raine spoke with a low warning in her voice, “Hey. Jan. No, not here, not—”

“No, no, no,” Jan huffed and tutted. “That’s not what I mean. I don’t mean because it’s her guilt or whatever. I mean because ... look!” A shiny metal gauntlet flashed in my peripheral vision, Jan gesturing out at the titans locked in combat. “You lot keep saying this is a dream, or a play, or whatever. And there you go. Final boss fight. This is only happening because Heather and ... Heather, and Heather and Heather and so on and so on, they all think it should be happening! You can stop this any time, can’t you?!”

“She’s right,” I murmured. “She’s correct. But I can’t stop it. Not like this.”

I nodded as I spoke, numb to everything beyond the sight of Tenny fighting my Guilt.

Tenny was, after all, the only thing which could fight my Survivor’s Guilt head-on, toe-to-toe, as an equal. Tenny was proof that I’d done something good in the world, that I had given selflessly, to help raise her from nothing but spare spirit parts. Tenny was external proof that I was capable of more than this self-destruction. But that didn't mean she was going to win.

Out in the giant's battlefield, Leviathan Heather managed to wrench her left hand free of Tenny's tentacles, ripping it from the spongy grip with a great tearing sound of sticky suckers and toothed maws. She reeled back as Tenny was forced to let go, as if winding up for another punch; but Leviathan Me spread her fingers instead, massive black claws catching a glint of light from the Eye above. Her talons sliced through the air, too sharp and too wide for Tenny to catch in time.

My Guilt raked her talons across Tenny's snout-like dream-form face; a spurt of dark blood shot into the air, caught as an arc of blackish crimson before splattering down into the waters below.

"Prrrrrt!" Tenny trilled in wounded pain, stumbling to one side. A trio of nasty gashes marked her cheek, bleeding freely down her face. "Prrrrbt-brrrt!"

Beside Me, Lonely Heather exploded with incandescent rage. "How dare you?!" she shrieked. "You— how dare you strike her! I did everything to avoid that! You— you— I hate you! I hate you, I hate you, I hate you!"

I and the six Abyssals had to cling to her, or she would have climbed over the ledge into empty air.

The Leviathan swept her hand back for another open-palmed strike; Tenny lashed out with a cluster of tentacles and stopped her arm mid-air. The pair of them grappled together, great churning seas sloshing about their legs, waters still rising, rapidly now. Six Caterpillars circled the Leviathan of Guilt, dooting and tooting up at her, but to little effect. It was only a matter of time until she managed to hit Tenny again, or the waters rose and rose and rose until her natural aquatic biology would give her the advantage in the fight. She would wear Tenny down. Without intervention, my Guilt would win.

Fighting was no way to end this.

I could not win by killing my Guilt, just as she would not win anything but her own extinction if she triumphed over Tenny and drowned us all in the waters of her womb.

“Tenny!” I yelled. “Tenny!” I slapped the low concrete wall with one hand, a rather absurd gesture to get her attention. “Tenny, Tenny, I need you to listen to me! Tenny!”

The Abyssal Heathers joined in too, tapping and hissing and waving their tentacles, until we all saw Tenny glance at us out of the corner of one eye. Amid the fight, she spared us a flicker of attention.

“Tenny!” I shouted again. “I have to talk to her! I have to, it’s the only way to stop her! Tenny, I have to speak with her! I need you to hold her, pin her so she can’t avoid me, so she has to listen to my words. And ...” My stomach lurched and my guts rebelled at the thought of what I was saying, but the alternative was death and failure and Maisie’s loss. “And I need you to get me right up in her face!”

“Prrrrrrrrrrrrrbttttt!” Tenny trilled.

Perhaps it was greater purpose that gave her strength — Guilt could not win against Love, as Sevens might have said, if she had not been wide-eyed and out of her narrative element.

Tenny surged up and out of the waters, wings buzzing too fast for the eye to see, cupping and pushing the air in great waves that made even the waters retreat for just a moment. She yanked the Leviathan sideways, forcing this Giant Me to stumble and crash down into the waves beside the hospital building itself. The ground shook with the impact, but we didn’t have time to scream.

Suddenly one of Tenny’s tentacles was before us, before me, hovering at the edge of the roof, dipped to allow us to mount.

Before I could make a plan, before I could even think, or hesitate, or feel the lurch in my stomach, ‘we’ acted as one — the six Abyssal Heathers looped their tentacles together with each other, cradling me and Lonely Heather within their combined arms. They scurried forward, clinging to the surface of Tenny’s tentacle with gentle barbs and the strength of their own limbs.

And then we were aloft.

I yelped as Tenny lifted us up and into the air. For a dizzying moment all of Cygnet was spread out below us — the hospital building in all its impossible gothic glory, folding in on itself like a flower of architecture; the Box, a broken wreck of metal and concrete, pumping out billions of gallons of water every second; the grounds, drowning beneath the dark salt waters of Guilt, the treetops struggling for a final breath, the lawns far beneath meters of murk; the distant perimeter wall, broken in one spot by Tenny's entrance; the little specks of nurses and patients on distant hilltops. The dream was for one moment entirely within my grasp.

A moment later we landed on Tenny's back, just behind the swell of her head, amid a low landscape of black velvet and thick white fur. The six Abyssal Heathers clung hard to that snowy fluff, anchoring us as we rode upon Tenny's back.

She lurched round, returning to the fight, like the world moving beneath us.

"Oh my gosh," I panted, my stomach punching up and into my throat. "Oh, oh, okay, okay, this isn't what I—"

With an explosion like an undersea volcano, the Leviathan of Guilt surged back out of the waters right in front of Tenny. Her skin streamed with run-off as hundreds of tentacles lashed at the air. A toothed maw opened wide with a screech of humiliation and self-righteous pain. She screamed right at us, making the air itself vibrate within my lungs.

Black claws swiped for Tenny's face once again. Tenny was prepared this time; she hopped sideways, wings buzzing either side of her body, filling the world either side of my vision with iridescent flickering. I think I probably screamed again, but screaming was so beyond importance that nobody cared. Lonely Heather certainly screamed too, but I held tight to her, to my other half, and to all our anchors to each other.

Tenny landed back in the waters, then lashed out and caught the Leviathan's wrists again. Guilty Heather opened her mouth in a hiss, that sharp-toothed maw filling the world above me for one heart-stopping moment. But then Tenny drowned her out with a chorus of trilling, so hard and so long that the Leviathan was forced to shake her head as if plagued by a cloud of moths.

In the moment that followed, I opened my mouth, and shouted up at my own Guilt.

"I'm not going to abandon you!" I screamed. "Do you understand?! I'm going to feel this guilt forever! Even when we rescue Maisie — yes, when! — when we rescue Maisie, it won't ever go away! You won't be abandoned, or murdered, or suppressed, or silenced! I want to be one with you, one with myself again!"

If the Leviathan heard a single word I said, she didn't show it. She pulled both fists up and around, forcing Tenny to stagger after her or lose her grip. The six Abyssal Heathers hissed and clung on harder, lest we all be thrown off Tenny's back.

"You're going to kill everybody?!" Lonely me shouted up at the Guilt. "Is that what you really want?! Raine, Evelyn, Lozzie, Praem!? All of them?! You want to drown Tenny? She's an innocent! Are you trying to turn survivor's guilt into murderer's guilt?! Bury yourself in so much pain you forget you exist? Stop it! Stop it! Just stop!"

Heather the Leviathan hissed in Tenny's face, then yanked her fists the other way, finally ripping them free of Tenny's grip.

She reared up, both hands hooked into claws. Raising them high, she blotted out the light of the Eye, intending to slam Tenny's head down into the waters below.

I lurched to my feet, up on Tenny's back, anchored only by the tentacles of my Abyssal Selves.

"Do you want Maisie to feel what you feel?" I said.

Survivor's Guilt hesitated.

Tenny took the opening; she launched herself forward like a battering ram, propelled by the great power of her wings cupping the air. She crashed into the Leviathan's chest, sending her sprawling. Before the Guilt could slide into the water, Tenny grabbed her with as many tentacles as she could spare; Tenny swung her round and slammed her into the ruins of the Box, face pinned sideways on the roof of broken concrete, arms scrabbling for purchase against twisted metal, legs kicking helplessly in the churning water.

"Prrrrbtttt!" Tenny trilled — not in triumph, but with great urgency.

The Six Abyssal Heathers let go of Tenny's silken white fur; we slid together, down the side of Tenny's hide, a mass of tentacles and scales and hissing mouths, with two soft and vulnerable apes cradled in the core of this tentacle-ball. We hit the roof of the Box together, cushioned by the tentacles of the Abyssal Heathers, until we came to a stop on a relatively flat surface of metal.

Our ball of tentacles and limbs unfolded. Bruised and shaken and with the wind knocked from my lungs, I staggered upright all the same, supported on six sets of tentacles. Lonely Heather clung to my right arm, crying softly.

The Leviathan's face was before us, crushed on her side, hair lying limp across the ruins of the rooftop. Those giant void-dark eyes rolled in their sockets, panicking as Tenny kept her pinned.

"Look!" I shouted up at the sideways face of the Leviathan Heather. "Look here! Look at me! Look at me!"

The Leviathan's eyes rolled, focused on me for a fleeting moment. She bared her massive teeth, hissing deep in her throat, but I stood fast. I had something she didn't — conviction based on something other than self-hatred. She kicked and struggled and tried to buck Tenny off her. Water sloshed and crashed around the box, giant waves threatening to overtop our precarious platform. But I stared up into my own eyes. To look away now was death.

"Do you want Maisie to feel the way you do?" I repeated. "Do you want her to feel like this? Like you do, right now?"

The Leviathan stopped struggling. She finally looked at me, with no other distractions.

"Because she will," I said. "If you go through with this, Maisie will be in your place."

She bared her teeth again, then spoke, so low and so deep that my flesh itself vibrated. "She should have been in our place. We should have been in hers. We left her behind, we abandoned—"

"Then she would feel what you feel now!" I shouted into my own mouth. "She would be the one rescuing us! And she would feel the survivor's guilt instead! And she will, she will do, if you don't stop."

Survivor's Guilt shut her mouth.

"You think Eileen is going to keep her trapped, after all this?" I said. "The Box is breached, the waters are emptying. Maybe it will take years, decades, maybe longer. Maybe we all die here and that's that for us, that's all, that's the end of our story. But the waters will drain, and Maisie will be free, years or decades from now. And if you win, if you drown us, what is she going to see, when she emerges? Who will be here to greet her? To hold her? To tell her she's not alone? Nobody!"

The Leviathan opened her mouth again. "It is what we deserve."

"Maybe." I shrugged. "But is that what Maisie deserves?"

The Leviathan's brow furrowed.

I went on. "If the cost of her freedom is my death." I thumped my chest with one fist. "Our death, as you drag us all down with the rest of you — how will she feel?"

The Leviathan's massive form went limp in the grip of Tenny's tentacles. Her eyes softened. "No ... I ..."

"She'll feel what you feel now. What I do now. Do you want to condemn her to that?"

Leviathan Heather said nothing. Her lips went slack. She blinked.

"And unlike us," I said. "She won't have anybody to rescue, to make it right. She will live with this forever. And will she be able to live with that guilt?" I shook my head. "Because you're trying to prove that — that I can't live with the guilt. So, she won't either." I swallowed, tears gathering in my eyes. "If we die here, because of you, then Maisie's life will be very short indeed. Short, and filled with nothing but regret."

A vast sheen of tears gathered in the Leviathan's eyes. She blinked, face misted with more than mere melancholy.

She let out a soft whine. Behind her, Tenny slowly let go. The Leviathan Heather, my Guilt, my Regret, did not rise.

I took a step toward her, guided and supported by my Six Tentacles, with Lonely Me hanging off my left arm. We walked up to the vast and terrible face of guilt. I reached out and touched her cheek, touched the scales, running my fingers through the fur. She was warm. She was alive.

She was just me.

"I'm not going to abandon you," I repeated. "You will always be a part of me. But it doesn't matter how guilty we feel, we still have to rescue Maisie. Nothing absolves us of that responsibility, no amount of self-loathing can relieve us of that. To save her, I will accept anybody's help — my own Guilt, the Eye, Eileen, anybody. Nothing matters as much as rescuing Maisie.”

Leviathan Heather whined again, like a wounded animal.

“Punishing ourselves just punishes her,” I said. “We have to live, we have to win, we have to accept each other, ourselves. For her.”

The Leviathan closed her eyes. Tears ran from between her lids.

Beneath us, the wreckage of the Box shuddered and shook. Waters crashed on all sides, sending great waves of spray up into the air. The oceans were still rising. Back on the rooftop of Cygnet Hospital, my friends were shouting their encouragement, but I could barely hear them.

“It’s time,” I said, with a lump in my throat. “It’s time to end the dream, before we all drown. And the only way to do that is to save our twin sister.”

The Leviathan nodded, ever so slightly. Lonely Me took a deep breath and murmured, ‘Yes, please, yes.’ A chorus of Abyssal Heathers hissed in soft agreement.

“It’s time for us all to be one again,” I said.

A pair of clawed hands cupped my chin and stroked my cheeks. One Abyssal Heather — one perfect representation of my own abyssal truth — gently turned my head aside, drew my eyes into the black depths of her own gaze, and pressed her lips against mine.

Reunion, at long last.

bedlam boundary – 24.38

Once upon a time — down at the deepest nadir of one of the darkest hours of the long, cold, empty winter of my teenage years, in a moment of unmitigated weakness and hopeless longing, locked in a solitude and seclusion which masqueraded as privacy and prudence — I had kissed my own reflection.

I've never told anybody this story. I try never to think about it. I had never before wished to do so.

I was fourteen years old at the time. It was exactly five days after my fourteenth birthday, and seven days since I had returned home from what was then my longest inpatient stay at the real Cygnet Children's Hospital. The reason for that extended residential stay did not belong to the usual shifts and spells of my 'illness'. It had been caused by a single sharp shock.

Several months prior I had gone missing for a full twelve hours — one morning I had simply failed to arrive at school, somehow wandering off or getting lost on the short walk between the bus stop and the school gates. Despite the press of other students, the crowd of uniformed teenagers who had been all around me, all heading in the same direction, there was not a single witness as to where I had gone. At eight o'clock that evening I suddenly turned up outside those very same school gates, scant feet from where I'd vanished. I was screaming my head off, scratched and bruised all over, school uniform torn and dirtied, inconsolable with terror, bleeding from my nose, from several cuts on my face, with skinned knees and lacerated hands, and totally unable to explain what had happened to me or where I had gone for those twelve long hours. My parents and the other responsible adults were mostly worried about kidnapping, about strangers in the bushes, about terrible things which might have happened to me; after all, I was physically small and mentally vulnerable, easily led and easily confused and easily lost, and oddly reticent to give any kind of coherent account to authority, legal or medical or parental.

They had the truth from me eventually, of course, if only to put to rest all that salacious nonsense. My parents and the doctors had assured me I would not be punished, so I told them the truth. I had spent the entire day ‘hallucinating’ — one wrong step on that short walk to the school gates had transported me elsewhere, with a lurch of my stomach and a twist of my brains and a hooked barb of ashen reek in my nostrils.

I had spent the day scurrying across a landscape of dusty hollows made from jagged rocks, filled with the dried remains of oceanic creatures both great and small, stalked by the predators which had moved in after the rolling retreat of some vast sea, leaving behind this world of desiccated tidal pools. That tide was gathering once again on the horizon — a wall of water higher than any mountain range, the colour of old blood and fresh vomit, filled with the writhing giants of an alien sea, vast shadows suspended in the vertical wave. I had spent every minute of those twelve hours racing ‘inland’, trying to reach some kind of high-water mark — to no avail, for the tidal zone went on forever and ever. Thrice I had grappled with tentacled things to which I was simply another wriggling morsel of meat. Two times haunting voices had called out to me across the dried landscape, hooting and warbling frantic alien language in the scant moments I was silhouetted against the sky. And once I had fallen, hard and chaotic, scraping my hands and knees and chin on the crumbly rock of that Outsider dimension.

My parents and the doctors were convinced that I had spent the day wandering in a hallucinogenic daze, grazing my hands on brick walls, scuffing my uniform on ragged concrete, bloodying myself on some forgotten corner of the asphalt landscape, all while my eyes and ears had beheld nothing but the phantoms of my own brain. And I believed them, despite how real it had all felt, despite the raw terror, the scent of the ashen dust of the tidal pool world, the wriggling creatures I had peeled from around my own forearms, the way my legs quivered with a whole day of running and scrambling and crawling. I believed them, despite the small wrinkle that nobody had reported seeing me stumbling around the nearby residential streets. I believed them, because the alternative was unthinkable.

They cared — they really, really did care. They did their best. One must try to see it from their perspective, I suppose. A thirteen year old girl had gone missing for twelve hours, and when found she had been covered in blood, her clothes torn, unable to stop screaming. What would you assume?

It had all really happened, of course; we know that now.

My trip to the world of empty tidal pools was the first major Slip in nearly a year, one from which I had not been able to return for many hours, which had seemed to take my physical body as well as my mind.

I didn't understand any of that at the time. I was mad. I had done as mad people did. I was a danger to myself. I needed help.

The next several months of my life were spent at Cygnet, 'under observation', going through counselling, trying to stabilise my 'episodes', watching me for signs of another relapse. My parents treated this inpatient stay with great responsibility — my father became a sort of conduit for all the school work I was missing out on. They were determined to give me the best fighting chance a mad girl could have. They did what they thought was best.

But I still went to sleep every night in a cell. A well-appointed cell, bright and modern and full of books and comforts and not the least bit threatening. But it was a cell. And every night I could hear the other girls, the other patients, crying out or screaming or sobbing, all locked in their own little cells.

The inpatient stay ended in time for my birthday — just me and my parents, of course. I returned to school — quietly, unobtrusively, without fanfare, with faint hopes that I could rekindle the few casual friendships I had acquired. And I did, a little, enough to pass on by. There was no bullying, no overt shunning of the crazy girl, no nasty stares in the halls or cruel whispers behind my back.

Oh, I'm sure there actually were, but I never saw or heard anything of the like. Nothing so dramatic.

But the girl I'd had a crush on was gone.

Her name was Sutton. She was small and quiet and extremely blonde. She was in my year, and I often saw her haunting the library at lunch or after school, the same as myself. She had a taste for history books with big serious titles, which I respected and admired, but could not quite relate to, though I was intrigued; I believe that is what I found attractive about her — the way she would smile with a dangerous little hitch in her lips when reading about the mechanics of warfare and battle. Despite this intimate knowledge of her reading material and my rather detailed observations of her facial expressions, we had never shared a single word. How cliché, how typical, I know, but it's the unvarnished, mortifying, sordid truth. I didn't even really know her. In my teenager's heart, I was convinced that eventually we might meet properly, somewhere among the thin gloss of the library stacks, perhaps becoming aware of each other for the first time as we reached for the same book, and then she would look at me and we would both giggle and—

As I said, a teenage 'crush', an adolescent infatuation with mere image and imagination, barely worth the remembering even a year later.

But when I returned to school after the inpatient stay, Sutton was gone from the library, gone from our year, gone from our school, gone from Reading. Her family had moved to London to be closer to her father's job. At fourteen, such a loss can strike a surprisingly powerful blow. Teenagers can be very silly, after all, though most would have gotten over it in a couple of weeks.

But me? Ah, no, of course not. My madness had caused this. My broken brain had robbed me of opportunity, of agency, of chances to simply be. This was merely the first, the smallest, a symbol of the great destruction yet to come. My own insanity would rule my life and take everything from me. This I knew.

That very same night, five days after my fourteenth birthday, long after my parents were fast asleep, I crawled out of bed. My 'hallucinations' — the silent crowd of what I did not yet know as pneuma-somatic life — still frightened me, especially in the dark. But fear was a poor and pitiful shadow of the melancholy in my soul that night. I crept to the bathroom and shut myself in, then turned on the light, bright and harsh.

I stood before the bathroom mirror for a long time, looking into my own eyes. I did not examine my colourless hair or my pale complexion or the minor and meaningless blemishes on my skin. I did not judge my lack of curves or the rather sad efforts puberty was making with my chest. I just stared at — me.

I was not beautiful. I was not even pretty. I was like a drowned rat.

But I was all I had.

And I looked so much like—

“Maisie,” I whispered, as I brought my lips to the cold surface of the mirror.

I had not whispered her name in months. The forbidden secret, the unspeakable name, the holiest of holy hallucinations, my own twin sister, the girl who never was.

I tried to press my lips against my own cheek at first, but that didn’t work, because my reflection moved as I did; an elemental mistake in the heat of alienated passion. After a moment’s hesitation, I settled for lips against lips — knowing that I was kissing myself, not the ghost of my imaginary sister. I knew that I had to love myself, because there was nobody else to love, and I better get used to my own face, to my own lips, to the taste of myself. I was all we had.

But the mirror was hard and cold and inhumanly smooth. I was not there. I was nowhere.

I ran back to bed that night, crying with hot and terrible shame. I could not kiss myself, I could not touch myself. Maisie was not real. There was no reflection worthy of love, just my own inner ugliness, my own face in the mirror twisted with rage that I could not make that inner connection.

Did I know of the guilt, back then? Not consciously, but perhaps she lurked in my heart even then, growing larger, growing stronger.

Perhaps my abortive tryst with the mirror was our first argument, one in which she was victorious, and I was vanquished.

But now I had won, and my prize was the real thing.

My own lips.

We kissed, myself and I, upon the cracked and buckled roof of the Box, surrounded by the crash and spray and churn of the waters pouring from the heart of the dream, here in this broken memory of Cygnet Asylum.

It began with just me and one of my Abyssal Selves — soft human lips sliding against abyssal curves. She gathered up my flanks and hips and backside into her claws and crushed me against her arms and wrapped me in her tentacles as our kiss deepened. But then I began to feel my own lips — my soft, human, blood-splattered lips — as if from beyond myself, as if I was doubled somehow. Suddenly I was the one clutching my own slender shivering body in my scaled hands. I was the one breaking the kiss and passing this heaving, blushing ape on to the next mouth; I was the ape, I was the abyssal truth, I was both in one, I was all six. They passed me from hand to hand, from lips to lips — some gentle, some rougher, some biting, some cooing, some purring; I passed myself, holding myself, hugging myself, sliding swift little hands down into my pajama bottoms to make myself gasp and shiver. I brought my two halves — my most difficult division — together in the middle of six tentacles. I kissed my Lonely Self, long and slow and deep, until I could taste her tears and cry them myself; I was my Lonely Counterpart, still tortured with the belief that I did not deserve love, sobbing into a kiss delivered by myself.

Touch and taste blurred fragile boundaries which should never have been raised in the first place. Was I the giant, with her tongue extended to allow the smaller pieces of me to touch and squeeze and caress? Or was I the little shivering ape, cradled in the tentacles of six sharp selves? Or was I the abyssal instinct and impulse and image, razor-edged and athletic, holding up the two halves as they embraced and groped and climbed a ladder toward union?

I was all of them at once. I was. We were.

And with a shuddering and a gasping and a quivering flex of readied flesh, we had together something very much like an orgasm.

And then we were together again.

We — me, us, a multitude of voices inside one mind, The Calm and the Lonely joining hands, the Guilt finally content to provide her power, and the six Abyssal Fragments lifting us all up and binding us together as one.

We were once again Heather Morell, nine-in-one, one-as-nine, a unity of many, inside one mind.

“Unnnh?”

We were also waist-deep in churning seawater, rather badly bruised in several places, and bent double over a crumbling mass of cracked concrete and shattered metal. It was more than a little uncomfortable.

Lurching to my feet was like taking flight.

Salt water crashed and churned around a dozen legs as I straightened up and staggered back. A hundred tentacles flexed and coiled, all down my flanks and my ribs and my spine, stretching their tiny muscles, rotating little hooked barbs, tasting the salt-rich air with saw-toothed maws. Clawed hands came up before my eyes — my own hands, paw-like, webbed for swimming, each finger tipped with a beautiful black talon, clothed in skin of dark scales and thickly fluffy fuzz the colour of dawn spied through dying clouds. My tongue unrolled from my mouth, twenty feet long, brushing the sheathed razors of my teeth. My shoulders were clad in a new mantle now — the dark wing-like membranes of Homo Abyssus crossed with the golden yellow love of Sevens' blanket, warming and coating my skin, billowing outward with the tiniest movement.

My eyes flickered with translucent layers and water-tight secondary lids, showing the world in false colours, in the shifting kaleidoscope of heat and sound and motion; I needed only to tighten the muscles to show the truth — the great waves all around me drowning the world, the rambling buildings of Cygnet Hospital, the Box, the hills, the distant trees, all of it sized as if I was giant among a world of dolls.

We were whole. We were leviathan. We were a hundred feet tall and built like a dream.

For a fleeting second, we almost lost control — not in the manner of Guilt's Rage, for she was one of us now, simply another member of a collective, and in full agreement with the rest of us. We felt the water flowing past our dozen ankles and over our dozen shins; we smelled the close and reeking air of the salt-tossed waves. Our line of sight towered over the ruined Box, over the waves, over the treetops and the roofs and the hills of the dream alike. And all this, all these details, we could see them all at once, as if from every angle at the same time. We comprehended the tiniest sluice of seawater crashing between the broken windows of the hospital buildings. We saw the individual particles of grit beneath the bare feet of one of our friends. We watched the moisture glistening on the hard white carapace of a Caterpillar bobbing in the waves. We watched a droplet of dark red blood fall from a gash on—

Tenny's face.

It was Tenny who saved us, yet again, simply by her presence. We had been on the verge of observing, as the Eye observes, of giving up our specificity before the clarity and light and truth of our multiplicity.

But Tenny was standing in front of me, in her strange and dreamlike guise of more moth than humanoid. Her insectoid legs were buffeted by the crashing waters, her big dark eyes staring at me in wary caution, as if she was not yet sure that I was myself again. Her fluffy white antennae twitched back and forth. Her curled and cat-like mouth formed a silent question.

And blood — dark and thick and red, the colour of crushed cranberries — dripped from her cheek, where Guilt's Leviathan had struck her.

No. Where I had struck her.

Tenny opened her mouth, trilling above the sound of the crashing waves: "Heath? Heatherrrr?"

I nodded.

"It's me, Tenny," I said — and discovered my voice was a haunting call, a deep-sea voice fit for a kraken, scratchy and high and raw, yet rumbling like rocks on the sea floor.

I loved it. I should always have sounded like that.

"Heath!" Tenny lit up with a smile. "Heath all!"

From somewhere off to my right, a cheer went up, tiny and tinny. My friends, my family, my companions, my allies, cheering that I had come back to my senses.

But, before I could reach out and brush the blood from Tenny's cheek, I realised there was something so very tiny cupped in our right paw.

I made certain not to drop it, as I turned my palm up and uncurled my fingers.

It was the pebble, the little speck of grit which Lonely Heather had gripped and valued so hard — which I had valued so much, and still did. We all agreed on that now. We formed a temporary pocket of flesh in our palm, to make sure we would never forget the pebble again. We tucked it in there, armoured within our flesh.

Tenny had made us aware of the world, but the pebble made us aware of ourselves, of our sheer size now, our massive presence in the dream compared to the crashing waves, to the little crowd gathered on the nearby rooftop, to the spouts of water pumping from the ruins of the Box. The only thing bigger than us now was in the sky — the Eye, Eileen’s true body, hanging there far above the reaches of any wave.

The water was still rising. Soon it would reach our thighs. Within thirty minutes, Tenny would have to swim. Within an hour, my friends on the rooftop would have nowhere to go, nowhere to run.

“The dream has to end,” I murmured, like the rumble and rush of undersea currents. “The dream has to end. It’s time.”

I began by tidying up the loose ends, taking responsibility for the consequences of our selfish guilt.

First — the Caterpillars. All six of the stout little travellers were still bobbing in the crashing waves about my shins, struggling to stay upright, fighting the currents, dooting and tooting either for aid or in complaint, or perhaps simply calling out to each other in encouragement and solidarity. Tenny’s tentacles were not strong enough to lift them, for though they were small, they were dense as chunks of solid lead. I stooped, cupped my hands, and lifted them each out of the water, one by one, like aiding insects who had fallen into a swimming pool. Some of them were content to be carried on the waters cupped within my hands, while others shot out sticky black anchor lines and clung to my giant fingers. I deposited them upon a rooftop — a much sturdier one than the roof on which my friends waited. All six Caterpillars formed up in a line, trumpeting their thanks, or perhaps their approval. I touched each of them with a fingertip, as gently as I could.

Doot!

Next — Tenny, so wronged and wounded by our claws. I felt a terrible guilt there, new and fresh, as I turned back to her, crouched and waiting in the rising waves. Her snout-like moth-face was scored by a trio of gashes from my own claws. But this guilt would not fester, this guilt would not grow; we would cradle it and coddle it and turn into it something else before it could be born. I would not pass this trauma down to Tenny. She would emerge unscathed.

“I’m so sorry, Tenny,” I purred, my voice a rush of water in an ocean trench. “Let me kiss it better?”

“Heath?” Tenny tilted her head, in perfect trust. She turned the wound toward me.

I stepped forward, wading through the waters, and took Tenny’s head gently in both my clawed hands, cupping her chin and her skull. I unravelled my gigantic tongue, coated with antiseptic mucus, regenerative enzymes, stem-cell analogues, and more, more than my little monkey’s brain could comprehend. With infinite care we lapped up the blood on Tenny’s cheek, slathering her wound with our own biology, coating the lacerations with healing mucus, taking responsibility for our tantrum, our selfishness, our moment of weakness.

Tenny shivered and flinched at the touch of my tongue. The medicine stung. But she did not pull away. When I was done, she trilled and purred and nudged her head against me.

We hugged for a moment, tentacles around each other.

“We love you, Tenny,” I purred.

She trilled against my chest. That was all I needed.

When we broke the hug, I stepped back, ready for the third and final matter before the climax of the dream — my friends, gathered on the rooftop, waving at me, jumping up and down, shouting suggestions in their tiny voices.

“Big H! Big H! Hahaha! It’s a pretty fucking literal nickname right now, hey?!”

“Shaman! Shaman, you have it all!”

“Large Heather. Big Heather. I struggle to pun in the face of this magnitude.”

“Go get her, Heather! Go get your sister! It’s what we came here for!”

“Heathy! Heathy, dive, you can do it! You can do it! Don’t be afraid!”

Was I afraid? Lozzie’s tiny voice carried on the salt-reeking air made me question that assumption. Was I afraid? We, who had swum the deepest reaches of the abyss, were we afraid to descend once more into the waters of our own guilt? With guilt accepted, with our selves recombined? What did we have to fear?

“I’m not afraid!” I called back to them. “I’m not afraid! And I love you all!”

A tiny voice called out — one I could pick out so easily from among the others.

Raine, with both bloody hands cupped around her mouth, shouted: “We’ll be waiting for you in the waking world, Heather! Don’t dawdle, or we’ll be swimming too!”

I almost laughed.

Almost. A seed of doubt held us back.

Finally — after running my eyes across each of my friends to assure myself they were accounted for, safe and sound — I turned to the Box. The building was a ruptured shell, a flowered ruin of buckled metal and burst concrete, with great gouts of gushing water flowing with incredible pressure from every gash and gouge.

We readied ourselves. We wrapped our yellow mantle-membrane tightly about our torso and limbs, for warmth and safety and security, tucking our many tentacles close against our body for speed and grace and hydrodynamics. We felt with inner senses for the great throbbing organ of our bioreactor — triple lobes hanging heavy and hot inside our gut, like a second stomach, a knot of pure power, ready to be uncorked; we groped for biochemical control rods and slid them free, feeling the heat rise, until our belly was boiling and our skin was glowing with bioluminescent run-off. We allowed that energy to permeate our limbs, flowing into every cell, every gap between each cell, saturating every drop of moisture which made up this dream of perfection.

We selected the largest rupture in the Box — the one through which our Guilt had been born and climbed out into the dream. We strode directly into the gushing waters; the spout crashed against my front, but the heat of our bioreactor turned the salt-water to steam, flash-boiling it in a great cloud of white. We blinked protective membranes over our eyes and closed up our nostrils, switching internal processes to anaerobic respiration. There was no need for one last breath of air, not with my soul clothed in this abyssal culmination.

With both clawed hands we grasped either side of the rupture and pulled it wider, breaking metal and crushing concrete.

We forced our head in first, straight into the onrushing stream of seawater. We braced our dozen legs, put all our strength into our arms, and propelled our leviathan body forward, into the water, into the breach, into the Box.

We dived.

Down, into darkness, debris, and discord.

The interior of the Box was not the organic clarity of the abyss; it was a drowned maze of twisted metal, studded with sharp spears of broken steel, pockmarked by submerged icebergs of shattered glass, the aftermath of our own escape and self-pursuit, all of it pounded by the constant outflow of gargantuan pressure. Great creaking and groaning sounds filled the water, the bending of toughened metal, the buckling of tortured steel, the breaking of all these labyrinthine innards.

We swam against that sucking current, kicking with our dozen strong legs, scooping the freezing seawater with our massive claws. We kept our sunlight yellow membrane close to our skin, Sevens' gift and our own hard scales protecting us from the scrape and puncture of broken metal, our chitin plates turning aside unseen edges in the lightless chaos of the Box. We curled our massive form over the remains of twisted walkways and through the wreckage of broken cages, parting the glittering midnight veils of hanging fields of glass-grit with a swipe of our hands. We risked entanglement in great spider webs of wreck and ruin, worming our way deeper into the destruction, wriggling through spaces so tight that they threatened to swallow us — or spit us back out with the sheer pressure of rushing water. We encountered many smaller leviathans — still giants in their own right, but tiny compared to our size; these were the other inhabitants of the Box, swept up in our tantrum. Many of them were trapped, stuck in tiny compartments, or crushed by metal tangles which they could not extricate themselves from, or confused by their reflections in fallen glass walls, their own forms multiplied by the broken surfaces. We paused to free each and every one of these great and hidden beasts of the dream, untangling them from the ruins, shoving them toward the exit, toward freedom. None would remain imprisoned here once we were done dreaming. The pearl would be broken and emptied, at any cost.

We swam deeper and deeper still, past the wreckage, past the ruin, to where the centre of the Box opened out into a vast vault, filled with the coldest waters in all creation.

At the centre of that vault lay a crater of glass, the burst and ragged stump of Guilt's Prison — the prison which still held Maisie, down at the deepest point.

We hauled ourselves along the bottom of that vault, to the jagged edge of the crater. We pulled ourselves across that, too, across a landscape of transparent razor blades bigger than buildings. Then we paused at the edge, where even our abyssal divinity shivered at the vast emptiness of what lay below.

A sink-hole.

A great circular mouth yawned wide in the core of the Box, lined by the jagged remains of the aquarium glass, like giant's teeth carved from diamond. Each tooth was the size of a mountain; the range had taken me several minutes to cross. The hole itself was wider than a city, wider than the Eye, wider than the dream. It led down into utter darkness and frigid cold. Freezing water flowed up from those depths, chilling my scales and fur and tentacles as I paused at the lip of infinity.

It was there that I realised what Maisie had done.

When she had made the pearl, she had turned herself into grit. But how? By hiding, from both the Eye and from all reality — by wrapping herself in layers of protection and dipping her soul down into the space between worlds, into a space so few could follow, a space into which even the greatest and most terrible Outsiders were loathe to peer too deeply, the one place Eileen would never look.

Because I recognised that cold sea water, that stygian darkness, that infinity of oceanic potential. This was a dream, after all, filtered through the very same metaphors I had adopted the first time I had peered into the black.

Maisie hung suspended on the edge of the Abyss.

As I paused, crouched on the jagged lip of the crater, I realised that the broken glass of the aquarium was growing inward — creeping toward the centre of the vast hole, like a cut scabbing over. It would plug this breach eventually, this puncture wound in Eileen's soul. The flow of abyssal waters would cease; not quickly enough to save the dream from drowning, but Eileen herself was at no risk.

This abyssal abscess would not kill her. But the healing process would seal off what lay below.

There was no time to spare, no time for hesitation. Maisie's clock was still ticking.

I bunched my leviathan muscles on the lip of infinity, and kicked off, diving down into the dark.

The sides of the sink-hole fell away instantly; the secret cavity beneath the pearl opened out into endless black waters on all sides. Within seconds, the great jagged circle was nothing but a speck of lighter grey in the black, a dying star signalling the way home. Mortals, mages, the most experienced of monsters — all would have been confounded by this featureless void, and this was merely a water column suspended far above the truth of the Abyss itself. This was a vertical pocket formed by Maisie's sacrifice, drawing the tiniest sip upward from the freezing infinity below.

But we had swum the Abyss before. We had passed through the most powerful alchemy of the soul, brought it back to the waking world, wrought it upon our body, and survived. I was made for this place!

So I kicked my dozen flippered legs, navigating by the subtle flow of currents across my fur and scales, by the minuscule changes in water pressure or temperature or direction, by the microscopic swirls and eddies in the black. When the water pressure increased, I armoured my skin in thicker scales and hard chitin and purged my insides of lingering air bubbles and the memory of breath. When the cold intensified, I ramped my reactor higher, flooding my veins with boiling crimson pitch, heating my flesh until it glowed. When the dark became too maddening, I burst with rainbow bioluminescence, broadcasting my intent out into the void. More than once, strange questing things ventured near to my light and my heat — visitors from the true abyss below, single tendrils which belonged to unthinkable giants, or lost predators in the barren waters of Maisie's pearl. But when they saw what I was, they veered away; the few who did not required only a squirt of toxic ink or a cloud of electro-magnetic paralytics to encourage them to leave. I could not spare effort on blind wanderers.

Time ceased as I descended; subjective hours passed, then days, then weeks in this freezing black, yet I knew that the surface of the dream was not yet drowned. Time itself was stretched and smeared in this place, screaming in silence as we approached the event horizon of the abyss, this lip on the infinity between worlds.

I thought of my friends, clinging to the memory, pulling my yellow membrane tight around my flesh. This was not the abyss, I told myself. This was just a tidal pool, full of dark waters, soon to be emptied.

That was when I discovered my passenger.

I had almost forgotten about her, tucked into my yellow blanket when I had been divided against myself; I had carried her with me unthinkingly, down into this nightmare of freezing darkness. I found her inside my membranes now, pressed tight to my chest just over my heart, so tiny that I could have held her between the points of two claws.

The Praem Plushie was still with us.

The moment we discovered her we almost scrambled to a halt, swirling in the black waters, struggling with sudden panic — should I go on, should I turn back to deposit her safely where she—

No, said the Praem Plushie. It is too late to go back now.

But you're not meant to be here! You can't survive down here!

Maids may go wherever they are needed, she told me. And plushies fight nightmares better than any other. What finer companion could you wish for this descent?

But you—

I am your other daughter, am I not? You named me.

Yes! And I don't want you to get—

Even this, Heather, you do not have to do alone.

I could see there was no arguing with Praem. There never had been, after all, right from the very first time we had met. Even Evelyn could not dissuade Praem from her duty and her aims. And I comforted myself with the thought that this Plushie was only part of Praem. The rest of her was on the surface, at Evee's side. The halves would be reunited when the dream was done, and one half was with us. A good sign. Reason for good cheer.

I swam on, growing colder and darker, sinking fast.

Five hundred fathoms further down, I reached the first of the steel cables. It seemed to come from nowhere, anchored to the darkness itself, glittering in the pulses of my own bioluminescence, like spider silk in moonlight. Several inches thick, braided like hair, it plummeted into the depths ahead; to my leviathan size it was nothing more than a fishing line. I swam beside it for a while, then reached out and ran a hand along the cold steel length; it was taut, tight with pressure, thrumming at the lightest brush. When I severed it with a flicker of my claws, it sprang apart, each half scything off into the infinity of black waters.

Many other cables joined the first, on all sides of me, above and below, turning the featureless void into a glittering landscape like the splayed innards of a flayed cage. The deeper we swam, the more dense the steel cables became, all leading down, all converging toward a single point, at the heart of this abscess in reality, this pearl in the dream, this secret at the core of Cygnet Asylum.

And then we saw her.

At first she was a pale dot at the very limit of my senses, a scrap of ragged flesh floating in the dark. I could not tell if she was moving or if she lay still, or even if she possessed a face or limbs or any semblance of humanity at all. I was prepared for anything — a blob of featureless flesh, a ghost like sodden gossamer drowned in the seas, a fragile memory which I would be forced to cradle in my giant paws.

But this was a dream, and even victorious dreams can be cruel.

I swam closer, slicing through the forest of steel cables with my claws, ripping open the bonds which held us apart. I kicked hard, pushing deeper, until the very core of the place was torn asunder beneath my paws, and the braided steel cage lay in ragged waves all around me, hanging loose in the black waters.

And there she was, with her limbs bound in metal snakes, arms and legs pulled wide as if at the centre of a torture device, slack and empty in the core of her own sacrifice.

My sister. My twin.

“Maisie?”

She had my face.

Maisie Morell looked exactly like me. She was not frozen in time at nine years old, but had grown up in captivity, exactly as I had. She was not transformed into a blob, or a squid, or a bodiless spirit upon the air of Wonderland — because this was a dream, and here she had weight and heft and terrible reality. She had my soft brown eyes behind my own dark lashes, the very same neat nose above my pert little lips, set in my delicate jaw. She possessed my petite frame, my prominent collarbone, my compact, lithe, flexible limbs. She had my long, precise fingers, my downy hair on my forearms. She had my waist and my hips and my too-slender legs. She had my mousy hair — and there was the only exception, for her hair had grown long in her imprisonment and isolation, a great tail of brown which stretched far past her feet.

Her lips were slack, her skin was pale as old milk, and her frame was painfully thin. She looked like I had, a year ago, on the verge of surrender.

She blinked — slowly, just once, with all the energy she could muster.

Her eyes were dull with more than pain.

But she mouthed my name — “Heather?”

Maisie Morell looked exactly like me. She was the most beautiful thing I had ever seen.

I freed her from the core of her prison, gently unwinding the steel from around her legs and arms, peeling her free from the impression which her body had left in the mass of woven metal. I pulled her out, cradling her gently in the palm of one leviathan hand, for I was a giant compared to her. She lay there gazing up at me, struggling to keep her eyelids open; there was so little of her left, so little life and energy and awareness left in that body.

But the corners of her mouth curled upward in a tiny smile. She didn’t need to speak.

She closed her eyes after that, lapsing into catatonic unconsciousness, curled in a fetal position. Her heartbeat was weak and irregular against the palm of my hand, but it was there, and it was not guttering out or slowing down or fading into the dark.

We had made it in time. Our twin would live.

We cradled Maisie to our chest, as gently we could, next to where the Praem Plushie still nestled inside the yellow membrane, over the beat of our heart. With a dozen legs and one strong arm, we kicked away from the core of the prison, out of the ragged remains of the steel web, and into the open waters of the abscess. Behind us, the steel cables seemed to drop away, sinking into the black, as if sucked down into the abyss now that their purpose had ended.

We swam — up and up and up, through the black, the cold, the pressure.

And we realised, after hours and hours and hours of effort, that we were drawing no closer to the surface.

A great and terrible current pulled at our ankles. All around us, the flow of the black waters had reversed direction, no longer gushing upward to drown the dream, but sucking downward, emptying this lanced boil into the infinite dark seas of the abyss. Even our leviathan strength was not enough to fight this irresistible pull, this metaphysical emptying; the best we could do was remain in place, fighting the flow of the current, until at last we would be swept down with the final remnants of the draining waters.

A tiny grey dot still glimmered so far above us, a pinprick in the infinite black — the hole in the Box, the way back to the dream.

It was still open, perhaps by only a crack.

But we could not reach it, not with all our muscle, all our might, all our selves. We were nothing compared to that abyssal pull.

Realisation was followed swiftly by acceptance. I felt no regret, no inner struggle, no emotional torture. Oh, we argued about it, of course — Guilt's Leviathan most of all, for was this not the exact decision which we had convinced her to avoid? But it was not. This was no self-sacrifice, no act of self-destruction; we had not begun this dive expecting to fail, we had not entered this pit with the intention of our own loss, we had not gone into this for our own death. This was not self-sacrifice.

It was simply the only way out — though the way would be exceedingly long.

Kicking my many legs to stay suspended in the water column, I unfolded the fist which held Maisie.

I gave her three gifts, that she might reach the surface of the dream.

First, I opened the little fleshy pouch where I had held the pebble, so filled with meaning for us. This pebble was her, it was her in miniature, grit in the Eye. I pressed it into her hands and whispered through the waters that she must hold on tight. She squeezed both hands into fists around the pebble, even though she had not the energy to speak, nor to open her eyes.

Second, I tore off a piece of myself — a piece of the yellow membrane, the abyssal descendent of Sevens' yellow blanket. I wrapped it around Maisie's tiny form, like a bubble of heat and light and life. I covered her body and her face, pressing it to her skin, enclosing the long tail of her hair. I made sure she was armoured and warmed against the cold, that nothing may touch her.

Third, I took the Praem Plushie from next to my heart. I expected Praem to complain, but she did not. She understood this was the only way out, this was not self-sacrifice, and that this was not goodbye.

But still, she gave us a little hug. She did not say it, but she disagreed with this decision. She wanted to stay with us.

"No," I whispered into the waters. "That's why you're going with her. Because if I can't do this alone, somebody needs to tell the others."

Praem did not raise further question. I pressed her through the little piece of sunlight gold membrane I had wrapped around Maisie, until she was cradled in my twin's arms.

I held this buoyant bauble in a cage of my fingers, for just a moment, just long enough to feel doubt, just long enough to feel my muscles begin to weaken against the tireless rip of the current, just long enough for salt and tears to gather in my eyes.

This was not self-sacrifice. I intended to live. I was just taking a different route home.

But I could not be sure.

"See you soon, sister," we said to Maisie. "I love you."

Then I let go of the tiny sunlight mote, of pebble and membrane and Praem, all wrapped about my twin, about Maisie's form, trusting to her their power.

The mote rose rapidly, shooting up the water column like a bubble of air, natural buoyancy unmatched and untouchable by the sucking pull of the abyss. It shot upward, heading for that grey crack in the dream, that path back to my friends and allies and family. I knew they would find her, because all about us the dream was coming apart, draining into the depths, and would soon pop like a soap bubble in the dawn. Within moments, all would wake.

But I was down in the dark, sinking fast.

For me there was only one way out, and I might forget myself on the path.

I stopped fighting the current, stopped struggling against the pull of the waters, stopped trying to resist the urge that had ridden me and owned me and become me since my very first taste of the truth. When I could no longer see the glimmering light of Maisie's protective bubble, I turned in the waters, head down in the dark. I kicked hard, riding the flow, leaving the dream behind.

For the second time in my life, I raced down past the undersea cliffs, past the point of no return, past the freezing limit of the thermocline, down into the place between worlds where all reality melted away into metaphor.

Maisie was free.

But I plunged into the abyss.

??? – ??

We were hunched over a kill — still feasting and feeding, with teeth and claws and wide-hinged jaws all bloody and coated with gore — when the submarine found us.

Of course we didn't know it was a submersible, not at first.

We assumed it was another predator, a very large predator, so big and so confident and so powerful that it needn't concern itself with such petty matters as stealth or subtlety. All we could be sure of was that a presence was approaching us, as if stalking for prey among the jagged rocks of the ocean floor, with their coating of mushroom-pale aquatic mosses and sticky sallow-skinned mold, hung with dense sheets of thorny seaweed and encrusted with horns of diamond-hard coral. Whatever manner of creature was slamming through the waters above the tangle of rock, it put out so much noise and light that even the slowest and most inelegant of our peers could have avoided it with ease. It sang out a chorus of little vibrations into the pitch darkness, peering about itself with flickering pinpricks of dark red light, sweeping over the broken landscape in which we hid.

In truth, those who designed and crewed the submarine had intended it to be both quiet and covert; they thought they were being furtive, slicing through the freezing pelagic depths like a silent knife cutting cold flesh, safe and sound inside a sealed bubble of light and air and pressure, totally invisible to the void beyond. They had leveraged the most advanced expertise, employed the best quality materials, and armed themselves with knowledge few others could imagine, let alone put into practice. They had gone to lengths almost none had attempted before — pioneers down in the dark, in a way that should have been impossible.

To our senses they were blundering about, broadcasting power and threat, clueless and blind.

No technology could match the perfect processes of personal transformation. No book or account or second-hand information could substitute for raw physical experience.

Nothing could prepare one for exposure to the abyss.

So, we made the safe assumption — we were being set upon by a predator, either to steal our kill, or to pick off one of us as live prey, to snatch the weak from our seemingly ragged edges.

With a little rapid discussion via flickers of tendril and tentacle and claw-signs and a few squirts of water-borne pheromone, we agreed that this was, unfortunately, entirely our own fault. We had been very hungry for rather a long time, despite our constant grazing on the thin flora and translucent slime of the ocean floor. The huge half-eaten corpse we were devouring now had been an overconfident predator itself; it had tried to attack one of our number, then learned its mistake far too late, when we — all of us, all together, all working as one — had turned on it and brought it down in a flurry of wounds and blood loss and overwhelming numbers. That was how we had survived down here for so long despite our rather conspicuous behaviour and fuzzy biological footprint — by applying principles that were almost alien to the abyss. Teamwork and cooperation and pack behaviour was difficult to beat.

We had done our usual best to avoid the scent of bloody streamers floating off into the water. But perhaps we had missed a few particles of gore slipping past our teeth. Perhaps our warning clouds of toxin and poisons squirted out into the dark had not been enough to dissuade any eager scavengers. Maybe this thing which approached us simply did not care about the wounds we might inflict. Perhaps it really was a leviathan, even compared with us. Or maybe it simply did not comprehend our numbers and our unity.

We had to flee. We had to abandon the kill.

Very disappointing, but the abyss was still the abyss, pressure could not be avoided entirely.

We agreed upon a direction. We would head deeper into the tangle of crumbling rock and twisted little undersea valleys across which our kill lay draped. Among the drowned canyons and long-cooled magma-tubes was the perfect place to lose a pursuing predator, especially one of such apparent size. Whatever it was, it could not follow us down there.

Most of us grabbed a final few mouthfuls of hot and steaming meat, some even carrying it away in specialised pouches or bodily cavities, developed for precisely this kind of eventuality, this kill-stealing opportunist. A number of small arguments broke out; the newest and least experienced of us had to be restrained from darting upward for the open water, which was no escape at all, or else pulled bodily away from the kill as they attempted to cram meat into their jaws right up until the very last second. We could hardly blame them; such a grand and filling meal was a rare treat, and it was such a shame to return to the grind of chewing seaweed and cracking open the occasional crab for petty morsels of pale flesh.

But I — we, us, me and me and me — was the authority among the others. I was the only one with the size and weight and lethality to truly determine our direction, not to mention my wealth of experience from the sheer amount of time I had spent down here in the dark. If I said go, then we went, because the alternative was being left behind.

And we did not ever leave anybody behind.

So off we went, fleeing the remains of our kill in a swift cloud of elegant tendons and tightened sinews, fins and flippers and sharp-edged tendrils cutting through the freezing currents. Some of us wriggled through the water with sheer muscle power, while others jetted on streams of water expelled from within their light-drinking shells; others still pulled themselves along the rocks with masses of sticky tentacles, clinging to others of the shoal when they had to cross open water. A small number of us flitted and flew with methods even I did not comprehend, seeming to flicker or jump through the water at great speed, propelled by stutters of something that was not light, shrouded by invisible colour which opened holes in the ocean. Those few had come from parts of the abyss I had never seen, from far-off climes and reaches beyond even my storied imagination.

We — me, I, myself — lingered last, floating in the churned-up waters just off the kill. We left behind thin trails of blood and the scent of fresh meat, so I covered our tracks with squirts of mucus-laced ink, clouds of paralytic toxins, and minefields of sticky burrowing burrs. I waited until the very last second, listening to that incessant ping-ping-ping from the approaching mega-predator. I watched the way those tiny red light-feelers crawled across the rocks, mapping and groping and squeezing the ocean floor with flickering crimson beams. The mass of the leviathan was leaking sound and light in such chaos that I was stumped, overawed by a display which had no place in the cold and dark of the deeps.

Did I have some inkling of what it really was? Was that why I paused, on the very rear of my own pack, to watch it crest the nearest rocky outcrop?

Perhaps part of me knew it was a submersible. But that didn't matter. Survival was paramount.

I lingered just long enough to see a sliver of this strange and noisy predator as it crested a rise, still hundreds of meters away. Metal skin was coloured a deep sunburst yellow, studded with glass eyes and darkened lamps and a face of steel feelers.

We squirted one last warning directly into that distant face — a cloud of ink and toxic mucus laced with a thousand tiny lances, enough to sting and burn and make it clear we were capable of more.

We did not wait to see how it reacted, or for it to reveal more of itself. We turned and fled, following the rest of our shoal down into the ragged rocky underworld of the sea floor.

Months passed by down there. We travelled far, moving fast. We flitted through ridged tubes of igneous rock, swam along the bottoms of vast crumbling canyons, preyed on the pale, scuttling, soft-bodied things which lived in the cracks and hollows of the abyssal trenches. We crossed a distance further than all of planet Earth's oceans, keeping our heads beneath the rocky crust, but always angling upward — never down, never descending into those ancient volcanic vents.

We were heading upward, you see? Always upward, always higher, always toward that distant surface, that sunlight zone which still lay lifetimes away.

We had been heading in that direction since the moment we had plunged into the abyss, though we struggled to recall exactly where or when that had been. Our reality was darkness and cold and the shapes of the sea floor. We were strong and swift and beautiful, wrapped in a yellow membrane of our own, powered from within by special reactors, the product of a perfect evolutionary process; we often felt at home in the limitless black of the waters, tempted to stay, to abandon the journey, to embrace the rightness of our own form and place. We were euphoric with ourselves. We felt 'complete'.

But I knew this was not an end. This — the abyss — was merely a different place. Another stage of being. And after this, there was more.

Up there. Beyond the surface. In the open air.

Not all of us believed in this vision, this promise, this strange echo of a memory. Some of us were simply along the ride, for very different reasons, for self-interest or safety or the novelty of the new or simple survival. I was the one making the journey, and I would gladly continue making it all by myself. But I had accidentally shown others the way to their own salvation.

I should probably define 'us' and 'we'. I'm being very confusing, aren't I? I do apologise, but I cannot help myself. Describing this is almost impossible as it stands. To be more specific is a challenge my mind can sorely afford.

But I must try. I must attempt the impossible, a second time.

We — me, I, us, singular and unitary and yet nine-in-one — had swum the waters of the abyss for years, perhaps longer, so long that we had forgotten more than we recalled. We had started our solitary journey down somewhere very deep, very dark, and so very empty, at the absolute bottom of some trench utterly devoid of life, empty of whale-fall or discarded bones, where even the marine snow was absent. Our earliest memory was of a great crack in the ocean floor itself, which had been recently sealed over with a plug of rapidly cooling magma. We had been alone then, alone and cold and confused. But we were also perfectly suited for this environment; we were leviathan, we were sharp and swift and smooth, with many claws and a great maw of teeth and more eyes than we needed and an array of tentacles on all sides. We had powerful flippers and many siphon-jets and armour all over our body. We were graceful and fast and unmatched by the things which came near as we began to explore. We were warmed by our internal reactors, and saved the need to stave off starvation by the anaerobic processes within our own body, filter-feeding off salts and grit in the water itself.

We had swum in those empty waters for a very long time, slowly climbing the deep valley in which we had begun. We ate rocks and sand. We floated on tiny currents in the dark. Whenever we rested we stared out into the black infinity. We felt complete, as if we were the product of some divine process which we could no longer comprehend, now that it was done.

But we had to go up. That instinct was enough to drive us. Up, up, up.

Eventually we left that trench behind. The first thing we found beyond those secluded waters was a hydrothermal vent — a cloud of black particulate rising into the dark from a little field of cylindrical chimneys, formed from accreted mineral run-off. We had settled there among the strange growths and pale little creatures, basking in the warmth and the nutrients, listening to the tiny chattering sounds of those others who drew life from this crack in the earth, watching their little dramas and discoveries, hovering over them like a moon in their tiny world. We stayed there so long that we became part of their mythology, part of the ecosystem ourselves, as we ejected spent reactor cores and grew new ones inside our body. The spent cores turned into new oases of change and mutation. We watched the processes with fascination, as the field of hydrothermal life spread outward with our additions.

But in time we grew restless — because rest and time had allowed us to recall.

Another set of memories lay heavy and dense within us, as if our abyssal body existed only to protect and cradle those recollections, but also as an outgrowth of them, as if we were both seedbed and plant in one. The memories were of an ape, all gangly and clumsy and gormless, not elegant or clever or swift at all. But she was beautiful too, in her own way, even if we could not quite see it. She had a name — ‘Heather’. And that was our name. She was us, we were her. She had brought us to the surface once before, and made us a part of her, and now she had returned to the abyss, and remade us from herself.

So the abyss was not an end. It was just part of a cycle.

And Heather had to get home, because she had a sister to see.

After many quiet and happy years around that hydrothermal vent — and many creatures which were perhaps the children of our cast-off parts — we left, heading out and away into the dark waters above, the first step on a journey to the surface.

Over time, we made friends.

This was a difficult concept in the abyss — friendship, comradeship, mutual cooperation of any kind, any meeting of minds or bodies which did not involve a contest over who was going to eat who. The scarcity of resources, the struggle for survival, the crushing pressure of water and darkness and the ever-present unknowns lurking out there beyond reach of sonar or feelers — a cocktail of danger which discouraged anything but tooth-and-nail competition.

But it was not impossible. My time around the thermal vent had taught me that. Another abyssal presence had taught me that too, though she was also a strange and ape-like memory — a mother in whose arms I had felt accepted and safe and secure, who had not eaten me or rejected me.

And was I not living proof myself? For I did not need to kill; my reactors kept me fed.

The first friend I made in the abyss was a mollusc. We met over her own most recent ‘kill’ — a nice juicy piece of slime-soaked moss she had wrestled off the surface of a particularly jagged rock. She was terrified by me, though all I did was watch her from a polite distance. One can hardly blame her; she was smaller than the size of my clenched fist. A leviathan like me could have scooped her up and eaten her in a single mouthful. She sprayed the water with toxic mucus, shot at me with paralytic spikes, and turned her shell a kaleidoscope of the most wonderful warning colours — deepest red and poison orange and evil sickly purple. She smashed into me with her coiled shell and ran from me when I did not fight back. She threw rocks and bits of bone when I followed.

I shadowed the little mollusc for months — not because I wanted to torment her, but because I did not wish to make this ascent all alone.

That was one of the truths of the abyss which we had not understood before. It is loneliness and isolation which makes this dive so difficult; when together, the beauty down here becomes so much easier to endure, so much easier to bring back, so much less final.

Eventually the little mollusc accepted that I was not trying to eat her, though this was not easy. The process only worked because I was obviously not eating anything else either — not other creatures, not the leftover scraps of her food, not bits of myself. She would bob in the water, watching me in return as I lounged on some outcrop of rock, my presence so obviously keeping the larger predators away from her vulnerable little shell.

One day, when the waters were very still and calm and we had not seen a whisper of another creature in ages, she drew close enough to reach out and touch one of my fingertips with a face-tendrill.

She didn't have a name. She hadn't possessed the concept of names until we spoke. She asked me to name her, but the only name I had was my own — 'Heather' — and another which I could not bear to bestow upon anybody.

After much discussion, she named herself after the sound made by her siphon — 'Silurt'.

It was a beautiful name. It was! But that is the closest approximation I can manage, with these clumsy, inadequate, ape-like sounds.

Silurt was the first. After her the process became so much easier. When one sees two creatures travelling together, one knows they are not eating each other. After Silurt came Uurent, a mass of tentacles with a tiny armoured ball in the middle. Next was Tushkernt, then Peneil, then Fandril, then more, and more, and more; all of them named themselves, all of them joined of their own free will, and all of them found something in the group which they had lacked in their abyssal isolation. As I rose through the layers of the abyss, swimming my years-long route back to the surface, gathering more and more friends to my sides became easy, a by-product of the journey, second nature to what we were. I offered something very simple — protection in numbers, safety when sleeping, and freedom from the cycle of predation.

We became a shoal, something no predator could hope to tackle.

By the time the submarine found us, all those first friends had grown great in size. Silurt herself was now a nautilus-like leviathan in her own right, as big as my torso. I was still the true titan among us, but I was not the only one, and not the only one who understood the value of what we had become.

Of course, none of this is true.

Everything I am telling you is wildly and hopelessly inaccurate.

None of what I am saying is literal; it simply cannot be. There was no ocean, no water, no perfect elegant leviathan body of my own. There was no hydrothermal vent where I remembered myself and learned how far the abyss could be pushed; there was no great shoal of friends forged along the years of journey — there were not even years, because time was not a thing down there in the space between worlds, in the capillary cavity between dimensions. There was no submarine, either. It is merely the only way I have of expressing what it all felt like.

All of this is metaphor, and none of this is adequate. I am forced to use the flapping of my meat — my lips and tongue, the bone of my jaw, the vibrating membranes in my throat — to render down a pure shining truth of starlight and atomic waltz and mathematical precision, into mere words. If this was a picture, it would be blurry beyond recognition. If it was music, it would be whispers at the edge of hearing. But it is words, and words are the only medium I have.

It was the abyss, and the abyss is not an ocean. It is not fields of fire and brimstone, or solid-packed earth filled with wriggling life, or an empty sky dense with cloud, or any of those things. It is not an infinite house filled with darkness, however much comfort and meaning my true and chosen mother takes from that particular metaphor.

The abyss is whatever one brings to it, and whatever one takes away from it. It is truth and beauty untrammelled by matter, unclouded by physics.

It is the abyss, and this was my second time in those other waters.

I hope my metaphor makes sense, because it is all I have.

When we — us and I and we, but also my shoal of friends all about me — reached the end of that undersea landscape cut and burned and carved by long-dead volcanic activity, where the canyons and tunnels and smooth shafts ran out into a sandy floor which extended for thousands of miles, as the ground climbed once more toward that infinitely distant membrane of the surface, we knew we were still being followed.

The submarine had tracked us, across all those thousands upon thousands of miles, for months on end. We had heard it pinging and beeping and scraping far above the secluded lightless holes through which we swam; we had spotted a corner here or a sliver there, hovering over the narrow canyon-mouths as we passed below. Sometimes we had been forced to outrun the scouts and probes it had dropped into the deep — strange twitching objects which we thought were little sacks of animated poison.

The probes were machines, of course. And the submarine was no predator. But we did not yet know any of that. All we knew is that something loud and terrible and confident had followed us all the way to the limit of our hiding place, waiting for us to emerge into open water.

We could not go back, because back would take us down. We needed to go up — to ascend, toward the surface, toward the membrane.

We had to be Heather again.

We lingered at that boundary between cave-network and open sand for weeks, stymied by the ever-present signs of the abyssal giant in the open water above us. We hoped it would leave, drawn away by hunger and appetite and the lure of easier prey. But it didn't. It sent those incessant sonar pings roving across the boundary-line of the cave system, sweeping back and forth with red-lit laser-eyes, sending out probes to search for the trailing edges of our shoal. We were the ones growing hungry, stripping every scrap of vegetation and slimy mold from between cracks in the rocks. I alone among our number was not beginning to starve, so I fed the others with the product of my bioreactors, nursing them from my tentacles, keeping them alive and healthy as we attempted to wait out this strange predator in the darkness.

I could have escaped by myself, of course. My grace and speed and power allowed me to outrun anything. But I would not leave the little ones behind.

I would not surrender to the logic of the abyss. I would transcend it.

Our patience began to pay off, slowly at first, then all at once. The great and terrible predator which had followed us all the way over the rocky landscape was forced to linger in open waters, waiting for us to emerge, making so much noise and light, making itself so very conspicuous.

Other predators began to gather, out in the dark, biding their own time.

We became aware of their presence first because of the subtle scents they left on the currents, and then from the sounds of the probing attacks they launched at the submersible — only a few at first, claw-and-tooth on metal ringing out into the black waters, followed by a swift retreat when the submarine proved too much for them to handle, punctuated by the strange crump-crump-bang sounds of the machine defending itself.

Within the space of a day or two, the attacks increased in frequency. The noise of clanging and tearing and explosions shook the edge of the cave network where we still hid, rising to a crescendo over a span of five or six hours.

And that was our opening.

We — our shoal, hungry and tired but still alive and whole and together — left our hiding place in a great cloud of muscle and sinew and tentacle, squirting ink and toxins and minefields of spikes behind us as we jetted out into the waters above the lone and level sands. The colossal fight above and behind us threw jagged shadows and bright flashes across the sea floor — alien and wrong in this lightless abyss, accompanied by the pressure-waves of undersea explosions and strange backwash from the battle. Several of our companions froze in unspeakable fear, or turned to look, mesmerised by this strange interloper into our dark world. I hurried them on, grabbing stragglers with my tentacles and hurling them forward, making sure that we left nobody behind.

Only when I was certain that I was last, did I turn back and look.

I thought I understood the abyss.

I thought that I — who had dived into these black waters twice, who had surfaced into reality and remade myself, who had returned and clung so hard to this name of an ape that I should be, who was a leviathan now in my own right, who was the equal of any predator of the deeps — I thought I knew the limits of the possible, down here in the space between worlds.

But there, hanging in the dark of the void, was an angel.

Bracketed by the flash and crump of underwater detonations, haloed by a whirling ring of tracer rounds and flare-lights and torpedoes in flight, clad in a cape of ablative armour and electrical shielding and the stubs of a thousand sensory feelers, surrounded by a dark ring of predators each a paltry tenth of her size.

She — I cannot describe her as otherwise, as an ‘it’, not with her graceful curves of imperishable steel plate and her shining halo-rings of propulsion system and the way her body was fluted and smooth and arched — was a machine, a submarine, a submersible. Built beyond the abyss, plunged into these waters on purpose. Not a living thing, not grown or evolved or self-wrought for these depths, but put together by other hands, to dive.

Such a thing was beyond my comprehension.

She was beautiful, in a way almost nothing else in my life had been, but also in a way that seemed oddly familiar, as if I had known this machine forever and ever, as if she had lived in the back of my mind since my birth. Ten thousand feet from tip to tail, painted yellow and red in the warning colours of an alien ecosystem, with great ring-sections rotating around the plump, plush, proud mass of her main body. She was armed as an armada, bristling with weapons — guns! Another alien intrusion into the abyss, one which I felt a tickle at those ancient memories of my name. Little metal orifices flowered open to disgorge torpedoes at the leviathans which plagued and mobbed her; tiny cannons swivelled all over her hull and squirted flickering lines of bullets into the water, chasing the predators which outnumbered her singular beauty; arcs of energy crackled from projectors, turning spheres of liquid into electric death as her tormentors slid away into the murk.

And she was — to my unbridled horror — losing.

The angel was far too large for any single abyssal leviathan to pose a real threat to her, but it seemed the desperate predators had learned teamwork too; they were working together to bring down this vast promise of prey. They darted in and out of her fields of fire, baiting her, goading her, forcing her to turn about and thrash at each individual attack. They tore off her guns here and there, or slid claws through isolated plates of armour, or cracked the great rotating rings which encircled her body, trying to cripple her propulsion and her engines and the heart of her energies.

Her loss would take a long time to play out. She might fight for hours yet, or drive off her attackers and limp on for days or weeks more. But if this went on much longer, she would not recover, she would fade and die.

I hung on the edge of the sandy expanse for precious seconds, staring in awe at this alien intrusion, unable to comprehend what it meant.

The abyss was infinite and boundless. I had to accept that I would never understand it all. Nobody could.

But this was not my fight; I began to turn away, to follow the rest of my shoal. I had to reach the surface, and breach the membrane. I had another stage of the cycle which I must return to, for this was not where I ended. I had to remember. I had to be—

HEATHER

My name was etched on the flank of the angelic submersible, in letters taller than my leviathan body.

I spotted it as she turned aside, to ward off another attack.

Torn between our retreating shoal and this signpost of our soul, we made the only choice we could. We squirted a cloud of pheromones behind us, pheromones which said ‘we are going alone, don’t follow, flee, save yourselves’. Then we kicked off from the sandy sea floor with our dozen strong legs, and shot through the freezing waters of the abyss.

We swam to our angel’s rescue.

She — the submarine-goddess — came about as if in surprise as we rose through the waters before her, cutting off the flow of bullets and bombs so as not to harm us. One of the leviathan predators took advantage of this lapse, darting in to attack one of her rotating ring-sections. We flew past our angel’s bow and slammed into the rival creature, easily our own size. We tore wildly at its body and face, ripping off great chunks of meat, biting through muscle and bone, streamers of blood spiralling off into the water. We kicked the attacker free; the submarine responded by opening up on it with a barrage of torpedoes, forcing it to flee into the outer darkness.

But there were dozens of predators stalking the angel now, or perhaps more, all leering maws and pinprick lights in the closing darkness of the abyss, barbed tentacles and poisonous feelers and corrosive tendrils tightening a noose around us. My angelic namesake was scored and burned and wounded in so many places, she would not survive this fight alone. I squirted clouds of toxic ink and lashed the water with my own hundred tentacles and made my sleekly muscled body flash with bright red-pink warning lights.

But I was only one leviathan myself. The circling sphere of predators edged closer, ignoring all my threats. They knew that they outnumbered us, and that if I wanted to live, I had to abandon the machine to her fate.

I twisted and turned, refusing to run, unwilling to give up this angel which bore my name. Hissing, screaming, thrashing at the water — none of it would work.

This divine machine had broken the rules of the abyss, attempted to survive outside of the balance of the ecosystem, and now she would be destroyed and eaten and forgotten.

Then all the other members of my shoal rose from the waters below — all the dozens of friends and allies I had gathered over my long sojourn in the abyss.

They had ignored my instruction to carry on without me. They had disregarded the need to flee.

We were breaking the rules of the abyss, too.

Dozens of abyssal creatures rose from beneath us, a cloud of tentacle and claw and flashing shell-patterns, hissing and warbling and filling the water with bioluminescent warnings, squirting toxin and ink and paralytics and worse, shooting invasive bone darts and packets of corrosive enzyme and puffing out their tentacles and flesh to make themselves as big as possible. My friends and companions stood around me on all sides, a sphere of protection around my metal angel.

Most of the predators scattered, fleeing this inexplicable group behaviour. A few lingered for several moments, attempting to pick off a weaker member, or flashing their own threat-displays on the assumption that the shoal would break in terror; they got seared snouts and bleeding limbs and flash-burned eyeballs for their trouble. A couple of the largest and boldest of the predators attempted more — darting in to finish the kill, despite our superior numbers. The first of those two was driven off in a cloud of its own blood; the second punched deep through our protective sphere, only to find out that the machine angel was not yet helpless. The submersible vomited up a barrage of torpedoes and bullets, wounding the final foolish predator so badly that it sank, limping off into the very same canyons and caves in which we had hidden for so many weeks.

And then the dark, the quiet, and the pressure of the abyss.

When the fight was over, we were left hanging in the open waters, surrounded by clouds of blood and messy gobbets of fresh meat. The stench would soon bring scavengers. All our shoal knew we had to move, and yet all eyes turned with infinite curiosity toward this submarine angel which we had saved, this machine which bore my name upon her side.

The angel's only method of communication was via her own sensors. She had no windows, no viewing ports, no true commerce between inside and out. She ran laser-light mapping lines over my body and face, over each of my many dozens of companions, and flashed little pinpricks of illumination in complex sequences, attempting to make sense across this gulf of embodiment.

I spent a few moments trying to decipher those symbols, then gave up and did things our way.

I closed the gap between myself and the angel, embraced the side of her body, and held on tight.

Scaled flesh against smoothly curved metal; twitching cannons against curled claws; coiling tentacles around glowing haloes. She was a hundred times my size, hot with the internal fires of reactor energies, vibrating with the power of her engines and her many weapons, creaking softly beneath the terrible pressures of the abyss. We pressed our chest to her steel, feeling the flex and flow of her body; we stroked her with our paws, learning the way she cut through the water, running a fingertip along the letters of my name etched into her flank; we pressed our lips against her many parts, learning her seams and secrets, and lay our ears to the flat places where we might hear.

By holding her tight and listening to her insides, I began to understand what she was.

She was filled with familiar sounds, cradled in a bubble of air and light and pressure, protected within a hundred layers of steel. Even if the leviathans had disarmed her, she would neither have sunk nor been truly breached. Those inside her rode in perfect safety, in a manner no abyssal creature could comprehend, because they were untouched by the black and the cold and the infinite waters.

I heard the scuff of footsteps, the murmur of voices, the rustle of clothing. Somebody laughed. Somebody else made a sound which was my name, spoken by flapping meat. A third person banged on the hull, to let me know.

Alien beyond words, down in the abyss.

These things should not have been dragged that deep.

I unwound myself from the angel's embrace and floated back a little in the waters, so I could look at her full length once again. I cooed and purred and let my chest vibrate, speaking words across the liquid medium.

"You didn't need to come down here and get me," I said. "I'm on my way home. I'm not lost. I just ... wandered, briefly."

The red pin-lights on the angel's exterior flashed and blinked; I understood them now, because I understood who was inside the submersible, who had dived into the abyss protected and cradled by technology and machine, by steel and plastic and rubber — by magic.

The flashing lights were angry and short-tempered.

You absolute incorrigible idiot! the lights said. You're taking forever!
You can't blame us for panic—

The lights swirled and settled.

Tell Heathy I'm saying hello! Can you tell her?! Hello, Heathy!

Can she actually, like, hear us? Is that how this works?

I have no earthly fucking clue! Let me concentrate—

Abyssal journeys do not work like that, human. She is not experiencing what you experience. Her own mind will filter for her. As it did for us.

Yeah, what the freaky plant-barrel said. Abyss ain't like that.

Thank you, goat meat.

Everybody stop! I'm the one channelling this, let me—

Hey, Heather.

That final voice was so full of sunlight that it almost lit the abyss, beaming with confidence. The voice which had first pulled me from the deeps, from the long darkness of my own soul.

“Yes?” I said.

Take as long as you need. We’ve got you. No need for executive decisions here.

If I had tear ducts, I would have cried. Instead, I reached out to stroke the steel angel, running the edges of my claws along the eternal metal of her body.

“Everything is going to be okay,” I said. “I promise. I’m on my way home.”

We — me, myself, and I, plus all the abyssal companions of my shoal, joined now by the dented and damaged but still hale and hearty machine-angel sent by my friends — descended together, back toward the sandy floor of the abyssal ocean, leaving behind the cloud of blood and viscera from our fight.

The ocean floor tilted upward, climbing toward the far-off sky of the membrane between worlds.

Once again, I must explain, lest I sow discord and confusion among those teeming billions who will never see the black waters so far from light; there was no submarine, no battle with torpedoes and guns and explosions, no angel of the deep made of steel and iron, no lights which spoke in the voices of my friends. This is metaphor, mere words, and cannot capture the transcendent truth of experience.

My friends had sent something down to fetch me home. And they were carried within it, in a way I cannot explain. I saw it as a submarine a hundred times the size of any ship, and it was, in another way, the greatest thing I had ever seen.

But that was merely how I saw it, and this is merely the best I can do. Pardon my poor words, dear ape, or Outsider, or other, but this is the best I can do.

The rest of our journey to the surface was more tale than I can possibly tell here. We passed over empty expanses of obsidian sand which concealed great beasts a thousand times still larger than our size, predators content to await some future prey worth their stirring; we crossed fields of hydrothermal vents peopled by strange forms found nowhere else in the abyss, things which fought us off in massed waves if we dared dip too close. We swam through coral forests which sang with tiny voices, hiding within their living hearts secret grottos where the aged and ancient progenitors of these woodlands held court. We ascended through draped jungles of pale seaweed and mushroom-like growth. We fought with predators and scavengers and strange things from the darkness which did not belong in those waters. We lost friends — not many, but some, for the abyss is still the abyss, and not all can survive the ascent.

And we made this journey with both kinds of companion at our side, abyssal and earthly.

After lifetimes in the deep we reached that layer of dark green murky water, lit by the faintest trickle of sunlight which struggles down from above.

It was there that we had to bid farewell to our shoal. The waters above — the zones of increasing light, though still deeply murky — were more dangerous than even the darkest reaches of the ocean floor. Up here the greatest leviathans floated with the currents, beings a million times our size, grown vast and heavy and slow with the effort of their ascent. To lead our shoal further on would only get them all killed.

Saying goodbye was not easy. Many did not want to leave, but they all understood they must. Silurt, my first friend, my little mollusc who had overcome her terror, lingered for the longest, pushing her beautiful coiled shell up through the waters alongside myself and the submersible.

But even she had to depart in the end. We shared an embrace, something akin to a kiss, and then I let her fall away, sinking back into the depths to rejoin the safety of the shoal.

I had left them all with that, at least — solidarity and safety, in numbers and each other. I had left something new in the abyss.

But for us, there was only up.

We rose through the final layers of the abyss now, me and the angelic machine. We stayed side-by-side as we dodged the giants, slipping past vast and terrible presences in the subtle currents of the murky green waters. Three times we were almost caught — pulled into great blind maws by fistfuls of feelers and hydra-headed tongues. But three times we squirted poison and toxin and made ourselves too nasty too swallow, and the angelic machine at our side hurled her explosions and bullets and haloed herself with electrical power, so we were spat out again, to continue onward and upward.

As we approached the surface, I went all but blind. The light was so strong that it seared my eyes. I had lived in the dark for so very long.

But the machine-angel held my hands in her rings, to guide me those last few fathoms. She led me up — up — up —

My whole body felt as if it was peeling away and coming apart, but up I kicked, through the cold waters, past the thermocline, until my skin seemed to bubble and boil and slough away and—

And then I burst through the membrane, thrashing and screaming and howling as water gave way to air, as my gills sucked on empty space, as I felt the abyss drop away behind.

I went home. I went back, a second time.

To be Heather again.

epilogue – E.1

We woke to flesh — to electrical impulses crackling across the grey neurons inside the bones of our skull, to our heartbeat thudding and flexing behind the cage of our ribs, to muscles twitching and quivering against their anchors of sinew and tendon, to blood and bile and mucus and acid and chyme all pumping and flowing and gurgling through our innards — — and we inhaled a lungful of fluid.

Warm, salty, thick as congealed jelly. A mass of saline sludge slid past our lips and rushed down our throat, carrying a tide of silt and the taste of hot iron.

I — me, us, we, nine-in-one and one-as-nine, as-yet-nameless in our vortex of stirring meat — was suspended in the centre of a bubble, surrounded on all sides by the pressure of this clinging jelly-mass against every inch of our skin. Two arms, two legs, six tentacles, a torso; one head on one neck, two eyes and two ears, and all of it gripped in a liquid fist, at the core of a sphere made from glittering silver translucence. The light — argent brilliance so bright it burned my eyes even through the meter or more of thickly-pressing gel — fell from above in a radiant wave, trapped and twisted and turned by the refraction of the bubble. Lower down came a smeared mess of other colours, blobs of pink, a mass of dark blue, copper and gold and distant rainbow shimmers, but those were pale before the silver tsunami.

We thrashed our limbs, but the gel was so thick we could barely move. Our tentacles pressed outward and met a membrane, fleshy and taut, flaring with strange sensation where we touched, as if pressing against the inside of our own mouth with a wet tongue. We pushed and strained and stretched the membrane, but it did not break.

Our lungs were filling with salt and silt.

We were drowning.

This was somewhat metaphysically confusing, as one might imagine. The ocean depths of the abyss are only a metaphor, as I have gone to great lengths to stress, but those dark depths are my metaphor, and I clung to it even harder with these first stifled breaths of reality's open air. Upon my first return from the abyss, after my first dive so very many months ago, my body had been engaged in reading a book, in the kitchen, at home, in the familiar surroundings of Number 12 Barnsloew Drive; I had rejoined my physical vessel mid-sentence, shocked and dissociated and dysphoric beyond human knowledge, with lost time and lost connection and more than a little self-disgust at this ragged bag of meat drenched in chemicals and studded with bits of calcified mineral.

But this time the transition was smooth — from the waters of the abyss to the unimpeded atmosphere of reality.

Except the 'open air' was full of salty gunk.

My body and all nine of us within it — lesser or greater, as we were, coiled about each other in a protective ball, never to be parted again — attempted to breathe anyway, imposing the metaphors of the abyss onto atoms-and-light reality. This did not go well, as our lungs filled with gunk and the gills — (gills? We filed that away for later) — which lined our neck and our ribs failed to extract anything from the glittering gel which pressed us tight. Our trilobe bioreactor stuttered to life down in our belly, guttered briefly, then blazed like a miniature sun inside our flesh, assuming responsibility to keep us from asphyxiating.

Panic was swift and terrible. All six of our tentacles sprouted barbed hooks and layers of serrated blade; we lashed out, slashing and tearing and hacking at the fleshy membrane.

"Mmmmmmm!" we screamed into the thick jelly of reality's womb, a choked and muffled noise, made with whatever pocket of air was left at the bottom of our lungs.

Breaking that fleshy membrane hurt, like tearing through our own skin.

But then we tore a slit, and the whole thing burst open.

The spheroid bubble of salty fluid collapsed as the membrane parted under the assault of our tentacles. We felt dozens of tiny fibres and feather-soft umbilicals rip away from all across our body, slithering out of orifices and peeling off our skin. We felt no sense of bodily invasion, no impression that we had been violated, only a parting from some cast-off piece of our own body. We felt our trilobe bioreactor ramp down an extra process it had been supporting, leaving behind this layer of ourselves as it fell away.

The bubble collapsed with a wet slap of fleshy membrane, like a dozen melons dropped onto a concrete floor; a wave of fluid fell after it, sluicing outward, steaming in the true air of reality, glittering and glinting in the blazing silver light.

And there we were — naked, wild, covered in our own amniotic vitreous humour, lashing the air with half a dozen tentacles, vomiting up a wave of gunk, coughing and hacking as we cleared our lungs and flared our gills to unstick their surfaces.

We were back.

We were embodied, as meat and mass. We were a chemical factory of dubious function and short life, filled with salt-water flows and stinking effluence, wrapped in flaking proteins, drooling and wet and slick and—

“Heather!”

Ah, our name?

That was the only word I could pick out from the whirling chaos all around our senses — my name, clear and clean from a voice I knew so well, a voice that had called me back to flesh once before. But the cacophony was too great; hooting apes all yapping over each other, alien paws and meat-clubs reaching for me, the glug and slosh and crackle of my own flesh, the shivering cold gel rapidly drying on my skin, the hiss and pop of fire and the creaking growth of plants, the dust in the air, the single silvered note of light pouring from the sky, all whirling and snapping and crying out with noises I could not interpret.

Because I was fresh from the abyss, and flesh did not yet make much sense.

But still we remembered the first time we’d done this, as a distant echo, as if in a dream. We remembered the horrible hooting apes were our friends. We recalled the stinking chemical factory was our own body. We remembered with some embarrassment how close we had come to pulling out our own eyeballs, driven by the sheer wrongness of the kitchen of Number 12 Barnslow Drive. We remembered how alien it had all felt, and how so very wrong we were.

This time we came a little better prepared.

We opened our mouth as wide as it would go — click-click-click went our jaw, unhinging as it went. And then we hissed at the top of our freshly cleared lungs.

Hiiiiiiiisssssssssss!

The apes stopped hooting. The fire eased down. The plants turned their petals away. We shivered amid a puddle of our own fluids on the slick, slippery, bone-cold floor.

But the silver light did not abate.

For one second, it was just me — and I and we and us — and our body.

We knew that if we turned our eyes down and looked at our hands, we risked that same dislocation and dysphoria as the first time we had returned from the absolute clarity of the abyss. We knew that to examine ourselves was to go through the horror of physical imperfection all over again. We knew the price, and the truth, and the result.

But we had chosen to return. We had chosen to come back. We wanted to be a person again, not just a memory of somewhere else.

We had to embrace our body, not merely inhabit this sheath of flesh.

We picked a direction, the first one which came to our blurred and tear-streaked sight, one free of apes and animals. We picked up our feet, skidding and slipping and sliding on the hard white ground. We broke into a wild, headlong, surging sprint.

My legs almost didn't make it, launching me the first few unsteady steps across the hard white surface, with claws clicking as if on concrete; but then we passed the edge of that artificial floor and shot out onto soft soil and the sensation of grass beneath our feet. Free and clear, we ran like we were made of springs and pistons. We sprinted with eyes wide, streaming with tears. The wind chilled our flesh beneath the coating of sticky gel, dragging air across the gasping flaps of our gills, billowing the thick, wing-like membrane which hung from our shoulders and upper back. We turned our head to spit out the last of the amniotic gel, then filled our lungs with a ripping breath of fresh air, cool and crisp and real, purging the remnants of our birth shell. All six tentacles gathered behind to throw us forward, slamming the ground and kicking us upward; we soared through the air, weightless for a second, before crashing to the soil once again, legs whirling as we ran, and ran, and ran, and ran.

We sprinted until our legs were screaming and our throat was sore, until our vision was clear and our body sang, lungs heaving for breath, muscles quivering with effort, the flaky remnants of amniotic gel purged by sweat and steam rising off our skin beneath the silver sunlight.

When we could go no further, we stumbled to a halt.

And only then — half-bent with clawed hands clutching my scaly knees, with tentacles reaching down to brace my shaking frame against the ground — only then did I realise who was watching.

Because I looked up, into a sea of silver.

“ ... Eileen?” I croaked. My voice did not sound remotely human, a scratchy warble well suited to something dredged up off the ocean floor. But it didn’t matter, because I wasn’t speaking to a human.

The Eye was open.

Not by a crack, not just a sliver of sight between two mountain-range ridges of furrowed black, but wide open. The mountains of her lid-lip had retreated all the way to the rim of the sky, to form a narrow margin of wrinkled black at the edge of the firmament. The sky was the Eye and the Eye was the sky, from horizon to horizon — a sea of churning silver light, like the surface of a star made from mercury and moon dust. Little eddies and swirls crossed her unthinkable depths, each larger than a dozen Earths, tides and troughs and swells and surges carried on currents of argent fluid. Illumination poured from the revelation of her innards, falling upon the world beneath in languid waves of bone-deep warmth.

I reached up toward her. That silver light caressed the back of my own scaled and furred hand, glinting on the sharp black of my claws, soaking into my skin.

And I did not burn.

Several full minutes passed before I could master my own awe and lower my hand. I cradled the clawed paw against my chest, amazed it was not reduced to subatomic particles.

Was this still the dream? Had we somehow come full circle, and exited the abyss right back into the dream-realm of Cygnet Asylum, all over again?

I lowered my eyes along with my hand, and discovered that I was sorely mistaken.

We were in Wonderland, as it had never been before.

A flat plane stretched off in all directions — the inner surface of a bowl, cupped by a distant ring of gargantuan mountains. The mountain tips were dusted with snow — bright and gleaming with a rainbow sheen of prismatic colours, as if made of oil rather than frozen water. The slopes of the mountains were marked with deep ruts, roads and tracks leading over their edges and down the other side, into a beyond that had not existed before, when this dimension had been folded into a crushed ball by the weight and heat and pressure of Eileen's observation.

At the foot of the mountains, the great ring of watching titans had been broken. Where once had stood a shoulder-to-shoulder phalanx of leviathan gazes drawn upward toward the magnetic power of the closed Eye, now less than a third of those bound giants remained, and those few were uncaged from their eternity of enforced rapture. A few still gazed upward into the sea of revealed silver, but no longer in poses of rapt attention; the ones who had chosen to stay lay upon the valley floor in easy repose, or slept with their own eyes closed, dozing upon their forepaws like giant cats, or closed up inside turtle-shells the size of continents, or floated in the air, paying attention to nothing. Some of them had moved — a few sat among the mountains themselves now, but most had simply left, perhaps gone past the mountain-border of Wonderland, heading for other places, for other dimensions, for the sockets of reality from which they had once been torn.

They had been the patients, the ones we had liberated in Cygnet.

Among the titans and upon the lower slopes of the mountains, I was surprised to see a few familiar white grub-shapes, so far away they were like grains of rice to even my inhuman eyes.

Caterpillars!

Lozzie's Caterpillars, exploring the contours of the transformed landscape, just as they had explored the quiet plains of Camelot. Most of them were up on the mountains themselves, but a few were trundling across the backs and hides of the resting titans, like smaller creatures exploring the fur and shells of larger friends.

A smaller number of Caterpillars were exploring the floor of the basin, among the blossoming ruins of Wonderland.

Where once had stood only the scorched and scarred stubs of so many walls, those same remnants of a long-burned world were now covered with the beginnings of vegetation. Creeping vines blanketed the surfaces, while fluffy mosses and spiralled lichens sprouted in the gaps between; clusters of bulbous stalks like flowering fungi reached toward the sky, rooted atop the highest points of the ruins, while fuzzy mats of thickened bulbs spread in the shadowed hollows beneath. None of it was green, not like Earth's vegetation; the plants of Wonderland were a riot of burnished brass and shiny copper, deep-sea blues and glimmering blacks, all suited to soak up energy from that omnipresent silver light pouring from Eileen's open lid.

Great jellyfish creatures bobbed and floated in the air — the very same floaters that I had witnessed in Wonderland before, no longer mist-wreathed specks of wrinkled flesh, but bloated masses the same colours as the plant life, coruscating orbs of metallic gold and bronze, highlighted in black and blue, swimming through the thickened upper air. Smaller forms scurried and scuttled among the lower ruins, the resurrected forms of the sad, burned-out remains I had spotted in the past. Glimmering compound eyes peered out at me from around a dozen ruined walls, as mandible jaws chewed on scraps of dead vine, their skin all the colours of the deep sea and the black of space, highlighted with gold and bronze, soaking in that silver radiance.

There was even grass beneath my feet, coloured a deep, dark, twilight blue, with patches of bright copper here and there among the billions of blades.

Holding my breath as if my intrusion might burst this bubble-dream, I crouched down and sank my fingers into the grass.

It was real. Soft and light and feathery against my palm.

The grass was sprouting directly up from the bed of ancient ash which coated Wonderland's surface. I curled my black claws into the ash itself, careful not to dig up any blades of grass. The silver light caught the flakes and motes of dust as they trickled through my fingers.

This world, Wonderland, had died a long time ago. Eileen's arrival had burned it beyond recovery.

But now it might grow again, into something new.

Footsteps approached my rear, but not with any stealth.

We carefully dusted the ashes off our hand, then stood up and turned around. We expected to see one of the apes — one of our friends, we reminded ourselves — but instead a phantasm of fire and curled horns and cloven hooves was striding toward us across the deep blue grass.

We blinked several times, trying to reconcile reality with the lingering truth of our abyssal perceptions.

Bright red hair, the colour of living flame, falling in a wave. Strong, sleek, athletic muscle, wrapped in a pair of jeans and a plain white t-shirt, arms loose and free at her sides. Eyes with horizontal pupils, backlit by firelight glow. Angular face. Easy smile. Confident gait.

The figure didn't have horns or cloven hooves, of course, not literally. But that was what I saw.

She drew to a halt about fifteen feet away. The short walk had dirtied her perfect white trainers with ash from beneath Wonderland's bed of grass. She raised a fire-red eyebrow — and also raised a bag of lemons in one hand.

“ ... Taika,” I croaked.

Taika nodded. “The one and only, and making a hell of a house call. Hey there, calamari. You've been down there a long time.”

Taika's words didn't match the motion of her lips. Her voice was like the crackling of logs in a bonfire, just as heavily accented as I expected, a mixture smeared across Eastern Europe and beyond, but it was also not her actual voice. My ears heard the flapping of meat and the whistle of air, but Taika could speak truth, directly into my head, as a fellow returnee from the abyss.

“Yes,” I said. “But I’m back now.”

Taika raised her eyebrows. “You sure about that? You wanna try telling me your own name?”

I let out a low, soft hiss, halfway to a warning. “I’m not stupid. I know I’m disoriented. It’s taking all my willpower to hold myself together like this. Why do you think I ran off? I had to ... embrace my body. Be my body.”

Taika shrugged. “Squids get spooked so easy. Come on, calamari. Say your own name.”

“I’m not going to perform for you. I’ll recover in my own ... time ...”

Taika reached into the bag of lemons. It wasn’t anything special, just a mesh fruit bag from Tesco; the sight of that familiar supermarket name against the backdrop of Wonderland in bloom, held in Taika’s fire-wreathed paw, sent my mind whirling with fresh alienation. What was real, England or Wonderland?

Then Taika pulled out a lemon, tossed it into the air, and caught it again.

“Say your own name and you get a lemon,” she said.

My mouth watered, saliva glands tingling in the back of my throat. We felt every barbed hook and little spike on all six of our tentacles flex with sudden tension. The gill slits on our neck and down the sides of our chest flared and quivered. Our stomach rumbled. Our bioreactor ached for the sour taste of lemon juice.

We were very, very, very hungry.

We hissed through a mouth full of drool. Several loops of sticky saliva slipped through our razor-sharp teeth and dripped onto the dark grass at our feet.

“Say your own name,” Taika repeated. “Come on, calamari. Work with me here, girl. Stop drooling and say your name.”

We wiped the saliva from our chin, slurping back the rest. We opened our mouth and hesitated; the name was like a handhold we could not quite grasp, slippery and slick beneath our grip. We scrabbled, bringing together disparate parts of ourselves. Six Abyssals and three Others all lifted together, all at once.

“He— hea ... Heath— Heather,” I forced the sounds out of my throat — then let out a great shuddering sigh as identity fell across me like a weighted blanket. “Heather. Heather. Heather Lavinia Morell. Heather. That’s us.”

Taika grinned. “Well done, calamari. Or ‘calamaris’? Is that how you English pluralise that word?”

“My lemon, please?” I held out a clawed hand, grasping at the air. “Catch.”

Taika tossed me the lemon. I snatched it out of the air with both hands and couldn’t wait long enough to rip through the peel; I bit directly into the waxy outer layer, teeth sinking into the sour flesh beneath. The tang of lemon juice exploded into my mouth, sharp and clean and clear, slipping down my throat like liquid sunlight. I sucked at the fruit, tearing it open, pulling the flesh out, gnawing and chewing and swallowing. I ate the whole thing, skin and all.

I stuck both hands out. “Another. Please.”

Taika was laughing. “Hoooooooly shit, calamari. I don’t think I’ve ever seen anybody eat a lemon with the peel on before. And I’ve seen some weird eating habits in the dark corners of the Earth, trust me on that one.”

“Just give me another lemon,” I croaked, flexing my claws. “I need — I want— it feels—”

“Bringing you back around, right,” Taika said. “Food’s always a good trick for that. At least in the cases I’ve known. Here.” She pulled out another lemon. “But first, tell me where we are—”

“Wonderland. Lemon. Now!”

Taika threw me a second lemon. That time I had enough self-control to shred the peel with my tentacles, dropping it to the ground; I figured that the newborn plant life of Wonderland could use all the help it could get, a little extra fertiliser would go a long way. I ate the flesh itself in three quick bites, down the hatch and no leftovers. Taika didn’t need prompting for the third, or forth, or fifth lemons, she fed me like a beast on the other side of a zoo barrier. When she moved to toss me a sixth, I waved a tentacle, shaking my head.

“All done?” she asked. “You full?”

“Fish,” I grunted. “I need ... fish? Soy sauce? Or meat, maybe. Or just ...”

“No can do, calamari. We ain’t going camping out here. You want a meal, you’re gonna have to dial this down a bit, and come on back.”

“Excuse me? Dial what down?”

Taika gestured at my body. “Don’t get me wrong, you’re a hell of a sight, I’m impressed. But you’ll bite right through your cutlery and put half a dozen holes through any kitchen table. Ease down, girl.”

We knew what we would see when we looked down at ourselves, but we did it anyway, because we needed to feel it.

Homo abyssus, in the flesh.

Our flesh.

My skin was a flowing riot of peach-pink blush and void-dark shadow, backed by subtle layers of chromatophore light, clothed in patches of elegant scale and bands of thick fur. My muscles were like butter, shifting beneath my skin in a way I had never experienced before. My fingertips were claws, black and sharp and curled; my feet were the same, clawed and elegant, digging into the soil with every step. My tentacles were as they had always been, strong and flexible and strobing with rainbow bioluminescence, currently studded with rows of spikes and little hooks and barbed swivel-joints. A long tail lashed behind me, pointed at the tip, thick at the base. A familiar yellow membrane hung from my shoulders, attached down my back, halfway between wings and a cloak. I felt teeth sharp as razors in my mouth, and the flesh somehow immune to being bitten. My tongue unrolled from my head, almost twelve inches long before I whipped it back in. My hair was floating like seaweed in slow currents.

Oddly enough, the lines of the Fractal were still visible on my left forearm. Some things never changed.

“But I’m ... I’m supposed to be like this,” I said to Taika. “I feel like ... me.”

The flame goat from the pits of hell laughed again, but her smile was genuine. “Sure you are, calamari. But you need to learn to put the claws away. And everything else, if you’re going to set foot back on Earth ever again.”

A pang of horror and rejection flared in my chest. I was finally what I was supposed to have been born as, all along; I had been this way for all of a few minutes, and Taika was telling me to go back? My lips peeled away from my teeth in a rising hiss.

“Ah!” Taika held a hand out. “Come on, calamari. You think I stay lit all the time?”

My hiss died away. “Huh? S-sorry?”

Taika sighed and clicked her fingers; the impression of flame and hooves and big black curling horns died away, like a fire going out. A moment later Taika was just Taika, a rather tall woman with striking red hair and impossible eyes.

“I don’t stay lit all the time, calamari,” she repeated. “If I did, no more Earthly pleasures for me, hey. Couldn’t set foot in a building without burning it down. Couldn’t get all up in some nice friend without causing some very nasty third-degree cooch—”

“Yes, yes! Fine!” I hissed softly. “I ... I get it.”

“Do you?” Taika waited, eyebrows raised.

“I ... ” I looked at my claws, at my fur, my scales, my everything. Me.

My friends were waiting for me. I couldn’t hug them with spikes and toxins. I had to put my claws away.

“Cos this is the moment you make the decision,” Taika was blathering on. “You can accept that sometimes you have to turn it on and off, or you can walk out there, beyond those mountains.” She nodded past my shoulders. “And—”

“I made that decision a long time ago, thank you very much. Save me the preaching. That’s not what I need.”

And with that — and a huff and a tut and a little glare at Taika for being so wise and right and so very annoying — I ramped down my bioreactor and folded away the dangerous parts of my abyssal blessings. I smoothed out my tentacles, reabsorbing the barbs and spikes, so they were simple lengths of strong muscle once again. I withdrew the claws on my fingers and reshaped my feet back into human form. I tidied up the mess of biotoxins and paralytics and everything else which shouldn’t have been on the surface of my skin. I clacked my teeth until they withdrew into my gums; hard to kiss anybody when you might bite through somebody else's tongue.

I kept the gently strobing chromatophores, most of the scales and the fur, the peach-bright sunrise and night-dark bloom on my flesh. That couldn't hurt anybody, unlike the spikes and barbs.

The rest of it lurked just beneath my skin, hidden for now, but not gone.

Never gone, never again.

Taika nodded. "There you are, calamari. Well done. You'd probably still turn heads on a Sharrowford street — I know what you English are like, you stare at anything and everything as if it's grown wings. But you'd probably not get a second glance at an anime convention."

I sighed at her. "That's not a compliment. At least, I don't think it is?"

Taika smirked. "It's totally a compliment. You should get your ass to Comiket one year. You'd probably get a dozen people asking to take your photo. Squid-monster girl, caught on tape. You'd be a real hit online."

"No thank you," I muttered. I had only the vaguest idea what Taika was going on about — and no idea what 'Comiket' was; I would learn the answer to that one later, from a rather reluctant Evelyn. Instead I straightened up, flexed my tentacles, and looked Taika right in the eyes. "My friends sent you after me when I ran, didn't they?"

Taika nodded. When she spoke again, the teasing amusement had left her voice. "Sure did."

"Because we're alike, aren't we? Both back from the abyss."

Taika smiled gently. "Because I know what it's like, yeah. And they don't, even if they try." Then she raised her eyebrows and glanced back over her shoulder. "Well, except those cactus girls, or whatever they are. But they ain't human. Different frame of reference." She turned back to me and shook her head. "You've made some strange friends, calamari."

"The ... Twins? Zalu and Xiyu? You've met them?"

"In passing. Your little friend in the fancy poncho has to do all the translating, though. Don't worry about that right now, calamari. You focus on you. You're still raw."

"I'm fine," I said.

Taika laughed. "No you ain't. I can see you ain't."

I sighed. "Yes, but I'm trying to keep a handle on it, thank you. I'm ... 'keeping my shit together', as Raine might say. Pardon my language."

Taika raised an eyebrow. "That counts as bad language for you? Shit?"

"Shush."

She waved the concern away. "Whatever. Anyway, you can stand here and stretch for as long as you need. Walk in circles, take a squat piss, anything you like. I'll turn away if you want. Your friends are waiting." She nodded back behind her. "But they're not going anywhere. Can't say I want to hang out beyond reality for much longer either, but I'll keep. Take a moment to really come back, okay? And don't try to bullshit me again. I know what it's like, remember?"

The mention of my friends — my family, my anchors — stirred something tense and knotted within my chest, like a muscle gone sore and hard from clenching for far too long. The sensation began to uncurl, filling me with need.

"No," I said. "No, I ... I don't want to wait. I want to see them. As soon as possible. I can walk, I can move, I'm fine." I took a step forward. "Let's go."

Taika shrugged. "Sure thing, calamari. Let's get you back where you belong."

Taika turned and led the way back across the blue-and-copper grasses of this new and verdant Wonderland, back the way I'd sprinted. I was a little surprised to see how far I'd run — hundreds of meters in what had felt like only a few moments. Time had not yet completely resumed normal function for me, upon my exit from the abyss.

In truth I was far from 'okay'; I knew I would be fine, given time and rest and familiar surroundings, but as I followed Taika's heels across Wonderland, I still felt dislocated and disoriented. Was this really our body, or merely a vessel we might leave behind at any moment? Was this transformed landscape a real place, or just another expression of abyssal perfection, warped by the lenses of my own eyes? Were we — us nine in one body — truly reunited? We had so much to discuss internally, and no time in which to do so, not right then. Instead I focused on the brush and tickle of grass against my bare feet, on the sensation of my hair — now lying flat again — as I ran a hand through it and raked it back out of my face. I tried to concentrate on the gentle breeze against my front, on the strangely familiar scent of citrus in the air, on the glint of silver light from up ahead.

Anchoring myself in the physical was easier than upon my first return from the abyss, but I still had to exert conscious effort to stop my mind wandering in fixation; if left unattended, my eyes would follow a single dust mote, counting every sister and twin to that one, knowing that the whole world was nothing but these motes of atomic definition and I was trapped within the same net, forced into a shape and a single form and I should be swimming free and—

And when that happened, I glanced down at myself again.

Homo abyssus was better than anything else I had ever been, no matter how much of it lay tucked away beneath my surface.

“Ah! Oh, um ...”

But then I realised, as we came to inhabit my body more and more firmly — I was stark naked.

Nudity had not mattered a few moments earlier. It barely mattered now; I had spent a second eternity in the abyss, what did a little full-frontal flash matter to us? But a light blush rose to my cheeks. That was more like it, more ourselves again. The fact that Taika had been getting the full unintended Heather experience made us squirm with mortified self-consciousness. We gently tugged the edges of our yellow membrane around our front, like a well-fitting cloak, so we weren't giving the whole of Wonderland front-row seats to our unmentionable parts.

“Wondered when you were gonna put some clothes on,” Taika muttered as she led me onward.

“Oh, do shut up,” I hissed back. “But, um. Thank you, Taika. I was rude before. Thank you.”

“Hm? What for?”

“For coming back for me. This time.”

Taika pulled an awkward smile and wiggled her eyebrows, but she didn't look at me; was she incapable of admitting when she'd done some good? Instead she raised a hand and waved at what waited ahead of us.

Spread out across what was once the topographical dead centre point of Wonderland, directly beneath the heart of Eileen's gaze, was the massive plate of shaped and fused Caterpillar carapace which had formed the canvas for the Invisus Oculus. The plate had been broken into four neat quarters, the edges of the quarters burned and melted as if by a cutting torch, perhaps provided by one of the Caterpillars themselves. On one of the far quarters stood the gateway back to Camelot — still open, the gateway surface shimmering with Camelot's purple light upon a background of additional Caterpillar carapace. I could just about spot a sliver of wall from Camelot castle, and a hint of Camelot's yellow grasses, on the far side of that portal.

On the closest quarter of what had once been the Invisus Oculus, a small group of familiar faces and figures were gathered at the edge of the plate. To their collective right, a long shallow pit had been cut into the ashen earth of Wonderland itself, filled with shining silver liquid, still and placid as a mirror, currently reflecting the silver light which poured from the Eye.

A few hands rose and waved to us. A strange knot twisted and turned inside my chest. My throat threatened to close up. My feet twitched against the grass.

“Run if you gotta, calamari,” Taika murmured. “I'll catch you up.”

I didn't need permission. I picked up my feet and sprinted back to my friends, my family, my pack.

One familiar figure ran forward to meet me — wispy blonde hair flying out behind her, pentacolour poncho in pastel pink and blue whipping at her sides, a huge grin spread across her goofy face.

“Heathy!”

Lozzie slammed into me like a little wrecking ball; without my tentacles to brace her, I would have gone flying. I caught her in a hug, holding on hard, spinning around in dizzying circles for a moment. My fingers dug into her back, my front pressed against her, my nose filled with the familiar scent of another person, another monkey, another earthly ape of flesh and blood and bone.

We broke the hug after what seemed like an eternity. Lozzie smiled back at me, breathless and biting her lip, a strangely manic light in her eyes, as if she had retained something from the depths of Cygnet.

“Heathy! You’re home!”

“Home ... y-yeah ... ” My voice emerged with some difficulty — because now I wasn’t talking to another abyssal returnee. I had to use human words and human sounds. I cleared my throat several times, unknotting the inhuman mass inside my neck. When I spoke again, the words were clear. “I’m ... I’m back.”

A second voice called out, grumpy with exhaustion and stress: “Lozzie? Lozzie, is she lucid? Is she there? For pity’s sake, is she—”

“The swimmer awakes,” sounded a voice like a little silver bell.

“Surfaced,” said another, a little stiff. “Hm. No. I will need to work on that one. A poor pun.”

“A sterling effort, though,” said yet another voice. “Keep trying, I suggest.”

“Hey. Hey! Squid-girl! Heather!”

I pulled myself together and cast my eyes toward the rest of my welcome party.

Raine stood at the very edge of the carapace plate, almost within arm’s length. She was dressed in jeans and boots and a leather jacket, as if we were on the streets of Sharrowford, back in England, rather than out beyond the walls of reality. Her chestnut brown hair was swept back from her forehead, her lips curled into a beaming grin, the same grin that had won my heart.

She had a machete strapped to her right thigh, and a hand outstretched toward me.

Behind Raine was quite a scene. There was Evelyn — my Evee, no longer beset by the horrific malnutrition of the Cygnet nightmare, restored to her plump health and hearty looks, though she wore a most thunderous frown. She was propped up in an armchair, a full-blown cushions-and-footrest thing, with both legs very much present beneath a long skirt. Her hair was tied up in a ponytail, her body was wrapped in a pale ribbed sweater, and she looked about ready to either scream at me or sleep for twelve hours — exhausted beyond words.

Praem was at Eeve's side — restored to her maid uniform, prim and proper, straight-backed and serious, milk-white eyes greeting me in knowing silence. She stood ready with a bottle of water, a thermos of something stronger, and presumably even more than that, carried in the bag which hung from her arm.

Seven-Shades-of-Sunlight was also perched on the arm of Eeve's chair, in the mask of the Yellow Princess, with a gentle hand on Eeve's back, as if to support her; that surprised and delighted me.

In front of Eeve was a massive magic circle, cut into the soil of Wonderland itself, encompassing the shallow silver pool which lay beyond the lip of the carapace-plate. The circle was like no magical construct I'd witnessed before — it was not merely a flat design, but served as a foundation for a framework made of wood, a pyramid shape of old beams. I had no idea what to make of that.

Behind Eeve — opposite the magical circle — was a big mess of pink flesh and amniotic fluids, still steaming. I knew exactly what to make of that. The mess was mine, the layers of bubble-womb I had extruded for my transition back into my own flesh. My own placental leftovers.

Further back was a sight I had not expected to see again, at least not so soon after the nightmare of Cygnet. Standing (or 'sitting?') at a polite distance from the magic circle and the pool of silver were a pair of what could have been mistaken for alien barrel-cacti, if cacti came in a mass of colours other than green and were tipped with fractal arms and starfish heads.

The Twins — Zalu and Xiyu, in their real bodies, as they had briefly appeared during the Cygnet dream — were stood upright, side-by-side, which I assume was their biological equivalent of sitting down. A pair of their tentacle-limbs were entwined, which I think meant they were holding hands. They were both very still and completely quiet, moving only the little globular eyes on stalks at the tips of their starfish-shaped heads. Probably trying not to spook the apes.

Standing on the other side of my afterbirth mess was a figure even more shocking, one I had half-accepted I would never see again.

Dark blonde hair fell in a long mane down the back of a laboratory coat. Bright pink eyes the colour of sunlight on coral peered out from an uncreased face, skin a light and dusky brown. Hands in her pockets, dressed in jeans and a coffee-coloured ribbed sweater, she looked at me as if no time had passed at all.

Eileen. In the flesh.

How? I couldn't even voice the question.

Hiding half behind Eileen was a figure I'd never seen before — a young teenage girl with more than a passing resemblance to Eileen herself, with the same burning pink eyes and blonde hair and light brown skin. Unlike Eileen she looked wide-eyed with anxiety, peering out at me as if I was very scary indeed.

I didn't have the sense of mind to ask who that was, because I couldn't help but notice that not everybody was present.

My mouth opened with a wet click, panic ratcheting upward in my chest.

"Where's—"

"Everybody's fine," Raine said before we could even ask the question. "Heather. Heather, hey, sweetheart, love. Look at me. Look at my eyes. There you go. You see me, yeah? You see me now? Just breathe, Heather. Just breathe."

"I ... yes, Raine. But where—"

"Everybody is fine," Raine repeated, almost laughing. "It's just that everybody isn't here right now. I promise you, Heather. Everyone who came with us, they all got out. Everything's okay. Just focus on you right now. I promise you. It's okay."

I nodded, trying to swallow the dozens of questions swirling in my mind.

As if being passed from hand to hand, Lizzie let go of me and Raine reached out. I fell into Raine's embrace, hungry for her touch in a way I hadn't realised until we'd completed the circuit of our bodies.

I clung to Raine for far too long, digging fingers into her back, almost gnawing on her shoulder, inhaling the hot scent of her skin and the familiar smell of her hair. She rubbed my back, cooing and purring and calling me all sorts of things — her squid-girl, her good girl, her sweet thing from the other side of reality. She told me ‘well done’ for coming home, she told me she loved me, she told me how good it was to see me. I leaned into her until my thoughts began to coalesce, and only straightened back up when Raine herself loosened her grip.

“I love you too, Raine,” I said, speaking to myself as much as to everyone else. “But why isn’t everyone—”

Evelyn snapped: “Because it’s four o’clock in the fucking morning, Heather! Because—” She paused and flinched, eyes going wide, flailing for Praem with one hand. “Oh fuck me, I’m going to be sick again. Praem, Praem—”

Praem was there with a bucket. Sevens resumed rubbing Evelyn’s back. Eevee did not vomit, but she did retch and heave for breath, then sigh heavily before she resumed speaking. “Because it’s four in the morning, Heather. Stop freaking out about that.”

Lozzie chirped, “Yeah, Tenna was here, but she’s sleeping now!”

Taika finally caught up and joined the edge of our group. She said, “And Miss January Martense won’t share a dimension with me, let alone a room. Can’t imagine why.”

Lozzie shot her a naughty grin.

Raine filled in the rest: “Twil’s at home. She did three days vigil non-stop, wanted to be here, but Eevee forced her to take a break. We didn’t know how much longer you’d be, on your way back. Zheng’s doing the same thing she always does when you’re not here — running around in the woods, with Grinny too, now. She said she has perfect confidence in you and we’re all worrying over nothing. The Knights are back in Camelot. Eevee’s grandmother, the fox, I mean, she slipped off as soon as everything ended, back into the streets. Everyone is in one piece, Heather. I promise.”

I blinked, overwhelmed. That couldn’t possibly be everyone, could it? I felt as if something was missing. What about all the patients? What about the nurses? What about Horror? And Cygnet, and—

“Professor Stout?” I croaked, settling on one. “And— and the others, everybody! Horror!”

Raine raised her eyebrows. “Horror was part of you, Heather.”

“Yes, maybe not her then, but ... ”

“As for the old professor we met, well.” Raine nodded toward the impossible figure of Eileen. “Better ask her.”

I turned my gaze to Eileen, still speechless at her mere presence.

“Stout?” Eileen echoed. She looked upward for a moment, into the sky-spanning silver sea of her own gaze. “He is hardly that short. But he is swimming, within. He has let me know that he will be some time yet, while he decides the way to go. Up or down.” Her pink eyes returned to me. “As for the others, most have departed for parts better known.” Eileen raised a hand and gestured out at the ragged ring of watching titans. “Some have chosen to remain. All are free.”

“The patients, from ... Cygnet, I don’t ... ”

“The hospital still exists,” Eileen said, and pointed upward. “Within. But it is no longer a hospital. Which raises a question. What will it be now? Those who were once patients are now forced to show a little patience, while it is built, here. I predict the project may take me some time. I’m ... rusted.”

I almost laughed. Raine let me go and I tottered over to Eileen, almost bashing her with my head as I hugged her, hard and tight, to prove to myself that she was really here.

She hugged me back, like the mother she always should have been.

“How are you even here?” I said as I pulled away. “How are you ... real?”

Then I noticed the mini-Eileen, hiding behind her, scowling at me with a cocktail of curiosity and fear.

Eileen said, “I am, despite my loss of a job, still a very skilled mathematician.” She raised a hand and flexed her fingers. “This was simple. She was harder.”

She indicated the nervous girl behind her. I stepped back to give the child some room. After a moment, she peered out around Eileen’s side again.

“Who ... ?”

“I promised I would take the puppet and make her a real person,” said Eileen. “I have committed this promise to flesh. Say hello to my biological daughter.”

I couldn’t believe my eyes, staring at—“Another sister?” I said, almost coughing.

Raine cleared her throat gently. “She’s a bit shy.”

Lozzie chirped: “Not to me! She’s lovely! Rainey is tooooooo scary.”

I crouched down, to bring myself to eye-level with this strangely familiar girl. She resembled Eileen, like daughter to mother. She had her mother’s face and eyes. Somebody — Eileen? — had dressed her in a long skirt and a thick, comfy, baggy sweater. She looked perhaps twelve or thirteen years old, but was that literal, or merely a representation of an abstract process?

“Hello,” I said. “I’m Heather. What’s your name?”

“She has not chosen a name yet,” said Eileen. “This is vexing, and yet also, delight. Perhaps you can help her.”

Mini-Eileen stared at me, with big bright eyes, round and pink.

“Heather,” she said. “I could have that name?”

She sounded just like her mother.

I almost laughed. “Well, that’s my name too, so that would be a little confusing. But if that’s what you really want. Think about it some more, yes? I ... I ... ” I straightened up and turned away, my mind still reeling. If there was a child, then— “How long was I ... gone? I ... I didn’t think—”

Evelyn answered, spitting with even more fury than before.

“Seventeen days, Heather! Seventeen days!”

“ ... Seventeen days?” I echoed.

Both longer than I wanted, but shorter than I feared. Seventeen days in the abyss had felt like a million years.

“Yes!” Evelyn was raging from within her armchair. “Seventeen fucking days! And then you started growing that bloody fluid sac around you, and I thought you were going to bloody well drown, you moron! You wouldn't come home, you wouldn't walk through the gates, you wouldn't even lie down! You just wandered in circles like a bloody insect or something, following anybody who happened to be nearby. You wouldn't read books put in front of you, you wouldn't eat. You wouldn't fucking eat! You—"

I silenced Evelyn's protests by staggering over to her and falling to my knees beside her armchair. I reached out with a tentacle, found her hand, and held it as gently as I could.

She shut her mouth, staring back into my eyes.

"I love you, Evelyn. Thank you, thank you for coming to get me."

Evelyn cleared her throat and looked away. "Well. Yes. Well!"

I looked up at Sevens. "I love you too, by the way. I'm sorry I was gone so long."

"Welcome back, kitten," Seven-Shades-of-Safe-and-Sound purred for me. "Well done."

"Welcome," said Praem.

Evelyn cleared her throat again. "I can hardly take credit for retrieving you, Heather. From what I could tell, you didn't seem to need much help at all, not with all the company you had down there." She flashed her eyes at me, almost angry again.

"E-Evee?"

"You haven't brought any passengers back, have you? Any plus ones? Any new 'special' girlfriends?"

"Um," I faltered. "No, I ... no. Not yet, I suppose."

Evelyn sighed and pressed her lips tight.

I wobbled back to my feet and cast my eyes over the magic circle cut into the soil of Wonderland; it was shaped unlike every other magic circle I'd seen Evelyn develop before, even the grand majesty of the Invisus Oculus. It wasn't particularly large — perhaps fifteen feet across, just wide enough to contain the pool of shimmering silver liquid, which I assumed had acted as a scrying pool for Evelyn to peer into the abyss. But the shape of the circle itself was strangely alien, making my eyesight blur as I tried to follow the outline; it was both circular and pointed at the same time, both a ring and five-pointed star in the same shape. The lettering cut into the soil was not a human language; I could tell because trying to make out the lines made my head throb with sudden nausea.

The pyramidal framework inside the circle was much more familiar — but I couldn't fathom why. It looked like a bunch of old beams, the wood aged and pitted, but strong and solid. The beams had not been cut to the shape of the pyramid, but lashed together with masses of tape and rope, braced with vast quantities of bubble-wrap and foam padding, as if they had been handled with the utmost gentle care.

"What did you see?" I murmured, staring down into the silver pool.

Evelyn didn't answer for a moment. Then she swallowed. "I'm not sure how to explain it. I'd rather not try. Maybe I'll write it down."

I squeezed her hand, gently, in my tentacle. Even for those who had not visited, the abyss was an experience like nothing else.

"Thank you for coming for me."

Evelyn took a deep breath. "As I said, I can't take credit for any of this. I may have done the channelling and performed the procedure, but very little of this is my work." She nodded at the circle before us. "This is the product of a trans-dimensional collaboration which would probably make most mages soil themselves with envy."

"Ah?"

A nasty little smile crossed Evelyn's face. "The fluid in that pool is from up there." She waved a hand upward, at Eileen's true surface, up in the sky. "The spell work is hers." She pointed at Taika. "The beams are ours, but—"

"Wait," I interrupted. "The beams, are you saying they're from ..."

Evelyn chuckled. "Home. Number 12 Barnslow Drive. You love that house so much, Heather. It was the best theory we had to reel you in."

I gaped at the beams. "You are going to put them back, yes? D-did this do any damage, did—"

Evelyn snorted. "Of course we're going to put them back! Most of them are from the cellar and the attic. Mostly the attic. God knows the roof needs the work. But yes, of course they're going back." She pulled herself straighter in her chair. “I contributed that part of the spell. All the real underlying theory was ... those two.” Her eyes flicked to one side. “Thank them, Heather. Not that you’ll be able to understand the response.”

Gently, carefully, I let go of Evelyn’s hand, and turned to the two she had indicated — the Twins.

Before I crossed the few paces of carapace plate to address them, I paused to hug Sevens — “Love you, kitten,” — and Praem, who said nothing, but patted me on the back exactly three times.

Then I stepped over to address the Twins, Zalu and Xiyu.

For a moment I didn’t know exactly where to look, other than up, because they certainly were both very tall. What with all the shocks and dislocation of abyssal return, I wasn’t able to fully appreciate the sheer beauty of their alien bodies, the bright colours of their hides, the muscularity of their starfish-foot tips and tails. In the end I settled on looking back into the eyeballs at the end of the stalks attached to the five tips of their ‘heads’.

“Thank you, both of you,” I said. “You barely know me. To put in all this work, just to help my friends dredge me from the abyss, it’s just—”

One of the plant-girl twins let out a high-pitched clicking, ticking, buzzing noise, like a cicada trying to speak language, filled with tone and meaning, and completely incomprehensible to our ears, even with the benefit of abyssal experience and nine of me all working together. This went on for a while, then fell silent. Both twins peered down, waiting for a reply.

“Um ... ”

Lozzie bounced up beside me. “Zalu says you’re very welcome, but please spare her the sappy talk! And she also also also points out that she’s wanted to test this theory for a while, you were just a very good candidate, so don’t think it was special or anything!”

Behind me, Evelyn sighed heavily. “Absolute nonsense.”

“Thank you for translating, Lozzie.” I focused on the Twins again. “Will we, um, see you again?”

Lozzie answered first. “They left a forwarding address! For meeeee!”

I nodded, numb with more questions than I could express. I turned away from the Twins, looking at everybody, or at least the portion of ‘everybody’ who was gathered here.

“Thank you,” I said. “You too, Taika. You didn’t have to do this. Thank you all, I—”

And then I stopped, a cold knot in my belly.

“Heather?”

Somebody voiced my name, urgent with concern. Somebody else said I was probably still hungry, and liable to collapse. Somebody else moved forward to support me, but I waved all that away.

“Where is she?” I said. I blinked and stared around, at the faces of our friends. “Where is she?”

Evelyn sighed and rolled her eyes. “We told you a thousand times! Through that!” She pointed at the scrying pool, made of Eileen’s silver sea. “You asked and asked and—”

“Well I’m asking again right now,” I said.

Ironically enough, Evelyn’s habitual irritation kept me from panicking; if she had shown anything other than total normality, I would have guessed the worst had happened. But I already knew it had not. The absurdity of the moment almost made me laugh; instead, I hiccuped.

“Heather—”

“Where’s Maisie?” we said. “Where’s my twin sister?”

Raine stepped forward, beaming with endless soft confidence. She took me by the shoulders.

“Maisie’s right where she should be, Heather. She’s at home.”

“You mean—”

“Number 12 Barnslow Drive. Alive and well, in one piece. She’s just taking time to adapt.” Raine nodded sideways, at the gateway to Camelot, at the road back home. “Let’s go see your sister.”

epilogue – E.2

Seven days later, a full week since my return from the abyss, at about two o'clock in the afternoon, I broke the uneven rhythm of my self-imposed vigil — primarily to shower, change my clothes, and eat a proper meal, but also to stretch our limbs and get some much needed fresh air into our lungs.

That statement contains a little white lie. I do apologise. We didn't break our vigil willingly; Praem forced us, of course. Raine was too indulgent of my every desire, Evelyn's protests fell on deaf ears, and nobody else stood a chance. Zheng could have bodily lifted me up and carried me downstairs, but keeping me there was an entirely different kettle of fish.

Perhaps they should have tried exactly that — a kettle filled with fish, an appeal to my appetite. I don't think that would have worked either.

There was no way I was leaving Maisie's bedside of my own unprompted volition.

We're probably making it sound more dramatic than it actually was. It wasn't as if I'd spent the entire last week shut up in that bedroom, looming over my twin, sleepless and fasting and driving myself to the edge of my own rude health. Far from it; I'd been taking showers almost every day, albeit rather rushed and perfunctory. I'd been eating properly, even if I was doing so hunched over in a chair. I'd even been sleeping, right there on Maisie's bed — or on a plush bedroll on the floor, when I had the sense of mind to lie down by myself. My sleep was very spotty and sporadic, that was impossible to deny; I'd been waking a dozen times every night just to check on her, stare at her, make sure she was alright, to touch her and confirm she was still there, still real, still right in front of my eyes. Over the course of that week, even the tiniest noises of Number 12 Barnslow Drive woke me with a start, had me thinking it might be Maisie, parting her lips, making a sound, whispering my name.

But it never was. Not yet.

On the previous night, Raine had finally coaxed me back into our own bed for an enforced eight hours of proper slumber, sandwiched between her and Zheng in a bold attempt to make sure I actually stayed where I was supposed to be. Zheng caught me creeping across the floorboards in the middle of the night, trying to slip out of the room so I could go check on Maisie.

Hence the new rules. On this day I was to follow Praem's instructions, for my own good.

It wasn't as if we were being forced to leave Maisie all by herself; that would be unthinkable, I would never have accepted it, not even under the threat of Night Praem. Besides, this was no solitary vigil. Number 12 Barnsloew Drive was home and community to so many residents that taking turns to watch over Maisie was very simple to organise.

But still, as Praem ushered me out of the room and into the cramped shadows of the upstairs corridor, I kept peering back at the open door, ears pricked for a hint of Maisie's voice. Our tentacles betrayed our desires, briefly drifting all to one side, preparing to bounce us off the wall and around Praem so we could scuttle back into Maisie's room.

As we passed the single window of the upstairs corridor, I felt our tentacles tense, our legs quiver, ready to leap at an angle so Praem could not—

Praem grabbed a tentacle, gently but firmly. We yelped and squealed and jerked upright on the spot, eyes flying wide.

"P-Praem!" I squeaked. "I wasn't going to— I'm coming quietly, really! I'm doing as I'm told, I am!"

Praem just stared at me with her blank, all-knowing, milk-white eyes. A stern maid blocked my path, brooking no excuses.

We faltered; we, who had swum the deepest reaches of the abyss. "I ... I wasn't going to ... I ... "

"You will be a good girl," Praem told me, her voice ringing like a little silver bell.

I sighed, my subconscious plot rumbled without so much as a single attempt. Praem always seemed to know when I was about to do some squid-based mischief, even if we denied it internally, us

Heathers split on the legitimacy of our actions.

“I’m sorry, Praem,” I said, and I meant it. “I just want to check on her. Just once, before we go downstairs?”

“It has been less than twenty seconds since you last saw your twin sister,” Praem told me.

“I know, I know that, but ... ”

“Self care,” said Praem. “Or Night Praem.”

I sighed a second time. I knew I was being unreasonable and silly. I needed to look after myself. What good would it do Maisie if I went unwashed and unfed? None at all.

My eyes flicked to the doorway again. I just couldn’t help myself, not after ten years. “But what if she ... what if she needs ... ”

“We will be informed,” said Praem. “Loudly.”

We nodded, mostly to convince ourselves; we did not all agree on this, and the internal debate was not yet settled. All six tentacles wanted to scurry down the corridor and wrap ourselves around our waiting twin, no questions, no hesitations, no delays, not even for Praem. The part of me that we thought of as ‘Calm Heather’ cautioned us against hasty decisions, and suggested we just go along with the flow. She wasn’t always right, however, sometimes she was too easily convinced of doing things she shouldn’t, too much of a Good Girl, even when she needed to be bad. ‘Lonely Heather’ — who desperately needed a better self-definition, but was too self-conscious to decide — was deeply unimpressed with all this; our friends and family were right there! They were all as good as us, they could look after Maisie just as well, and we were being foolish. The abyssal leviathan who was no longer Guilt, she knew that we could not stand up to Praem in any case. The debate was moot. Get on with it. Go eat a fish.

“Self care it is, then,” we said, forcing myself to turn around and march down the corridor. “Good girl mode. Just for you, Praem.”

Praem already had a change of clothes laid out for me in the bathroom. I attended to all the matters I’d been ignoring since yesterday — I brushed my teeth and took a long, hot, proper shower, with plenty of scrubbing. I made sure to unroll and massage each tentacle in turn. I wasn’t yet sure about cleaning the gill-slits that sometimes appeared down my ribcage and the sides of my neck, so I made sure to fold them away for the duration of the shower, tidying up the other pneuma-somatic additions I didn't need right then. We spent a couple of minutes playing with our chromatophores, making our skin glow and flare, until we could cast rainbows between the droplets of water; a poor substitute for the deep desire which lurked in my heart. I wanted to go swimming, of course, and a bath would only have made me sad. But swimming had to wait. The vigil came first, for now.

I blow-dried and brushed my hair, moisturised my skin, and even trimmed my nails a little bit. By the time I was done and dressed I was practically vibrating with need.

But I was not allowed to return to Maisie just then. Praem had been charged with the whole process, not just hosing me off.

Praem herded me down the creaking stairs of the house, across the familiar floorboards of the front room, and into the warm embrace of the kitchen. My besocked feet picked up a little chill from the flagstones, prompting my bioreactor to turn up the heat inside my belly, but I eased it back down. We didn't need the protection just then. We wanted to feel the house as it was, even if only as a distraction. We stretched out our tentacles and ran their tips along the walls, the edge of the wedged-open door, the rim of the table, and more.

"Sit comfortably," Praem told me. "Wait."

Praem had lunch all ready to cook, laid out on the kitchen counter — not just a sandwich with a few slices of cheese and lemon wedged into it, but the luncheon equivalent of a squid-girl-tailored Full English Breakfast. Eggs ready to scramble; two lemons for eating, one lemon for squeezing; a entire unopened packet of smoked salmon (a rather pricey gastronomic preference, the satisfaction of which I had Evee to thank for); half a tin of beans; a large flat mushroom to go under the grill; two tomatoes, equally for grilling; and a small cheese toastie, to be placed inside the 'air fryer' which the household had received as a gift from Jan.

We, however, felt terribly restless as Praem bustled about the kitchen, partly with guilt for being waited on — which Praem really did not have to do, she wasn't a servant or a maid, she was, in many ways, our daughter — and partly with the magnetic force of our gaze being drawn up toward the ceiling, our thoughts still lingering upstairs, with our twin.

Instead of twiddling my thumbs and vibrating on the spot, I got up and helped tidy the table; breakfast and lunch stuff was still all over the place, so I set about getting the dirty dishes into the sink.

Praem gave me a blank look. I raised both hands and all six tentacles with instant surrender.

“I’m not trying to escape, I’m just ... restless. Let me help? Just a bit of cleaning up ...”

Once Praem was satisfied that I was not going to go sprinting back upstairs, she returned to the cooking,

But a bit of cleaning up did not last long. After a few moments we were out of things to do. We pottered around the table once, then over to the door which led to the magical workshop. Nobody was inside except the pair of spider-servitors and Marmite, all clinging to the ceiling as usual, exchanging soft, brief touches of their face-mandibles. One end of the room was lit with the gentle purple glow of the semi-permanent portal to Camelot, and the table was littered with Evelyn’s books and papers and magical diagrams, all drenched in the heavy shadows of many closed curtains. I waved to Marmite and the spiders with one tentacle; Marmite waved back with a leg. I shut the door, trying to remember—

“Oh, right,” I muttered to myself. “Evee’s still napping?”

“Evelyn is napping,” Praem echoed, cracking an egg into a saucepan.

Evelyn had been taking a lot of naps since my return from the abyss. The ‘submarine’ she and the others had sent to dredge me out had required a great deal of energy and exertion from her, and no small amount of pain. On Monday of that week she’d surprised everybody by going to see a doctor — an expensive doctor with a private practice, on Harley Street in London. She’d taken the train down, accompanied by Praem. (“First time in a couple of years!” Raine had informed me.) According to Doctor Rosalie Brunot — who Evelyn had seen several times in the early months after the death of her mother — Evelyn was simply exhibiting symptoms of exhaustion and stress, despite a battery of tests to rule out anything else. She was prescribed rest and painkillers.

Real rest! the doctor's note had said, underlined several times. Not sitting-up-in-bed-doing-paperwork rest. Intellectual rest. Do nothing for a week, then we'll see how you are, Miss Saye.

Evelyn had taken this poorly, but she took to the naps like a natural. We could all tell that she was already doing better.

The house did seem oddly quiet, but that was to be expected. I had lost track of time over the last seven days, my normal rhythms of life subordinated entirely to the new processes of my twin sister. We — us nine, all a bit upside-down inside our own head for a moment — sorted through our slow catalogue of where everybody was. Eevee was napping, Kimberly was at work, Lozzie had popped out to fetch Jan, and Sevens was off visiting her father — a task I had yet to fulfil, to thank him for his help in Cygnet. Eileen and her as-yet-unnamed daughter had not visited Number 12 Barnslow Drive, not quite yet, though we had plans hatching for something soon, when Maisie was ready. Zheng and Grinny were out who-knew-where. Twil had come over, she was upstairs with Tenny, taking a turn on the watch.

And Raine ...

"Praem," I said, a little confused. "Where did Raine go? I recall her saying bye, but ... "

Without turning around, Praem said, "It is Friday."

"... oh! Work!" I laughed at myself, feeling very silly. Friday afternoon at the student union bar on campus; term had not quite started yet, but Raine's regular shifts had resumed, to coincide with the early-arrival freshers on their first days at campus. She was picking up a few more shifts before classes inevitably filled the schedule. "Yes, I ..." We sighed, rubbing a tentacle over our face. "Wow, we really haven't been paying attention, have we?" We flapped our arms. "I'm so restless, now, I ... you know what, Praem? I think I'm going to step outside for a moment."

Praem turned to face me, spatula in hand, blank-faced and staring with her wide and empty eyes.

"I mean outdoors, into the back garden," I added quickly. "Not Outside outside. You did say I should get some fresh air."

Praem stared.

“ ... Praem? What do you think I’m going to do, climb up the side of the house and scrungle in through Maisie’s bedroom window?”

“A distinct possibility.”

I laughed — giggled really, with one hand to my mouth. I felt so free. “I promise I won’t! I promise you. I’m serious, I need to walk about for a moment, breathe the air, stretch my legs. I promise, I cross my heart, on all the love I bear for you, that I will neither climb the side of the house nor make a spring with my tentacles and bounce up there, nor anything else. I’m going to walk around the big tree in the garden. That’s all.”

“Promise accepted.” Praem turned back to her cooking.

“Call me in when it’s done,” I said. “Thank you, Praem. You really didn’t have to do all this.”

“Yes,” she said. “I do not have to.”

We — I, me, us — wandered over to the open door which led into the narrow little utility room, slipping out of the relative brightness of the kitchen and into the shadows between the washing machine, the door down to the cellar, and the broken-backed old sofa. I padded over to the back door, slipped on my shoes — left there from the previous time I’d done this exact same thing, a few days earlier — then opened the door and stepped out onto the patio.

Chill air kissed my cheeks, ran feathery fingers through my hair, and cupped all six of our tentacles. We were dressed in only a t-shirt and pajama bottoms, but our yellow blanket came quickly to hand, hanging from our shoulders as if it was part of our body. We never had to put it away or take it off ever again; whenever we showed greater truth in our form, the blanket took on the aspect of a wing-like membrane. But right then, outdoors in leafy Sharrowford, it was a warm blanket.

We tugged it tight, to keep out the cold weather.

We also checked our appearance briefly, making sure our tentacles were not visible, our skin was not a riot of colour, and we weren’t sporting any spikes or showing our tail, despite the desire to wiggle it in the open air. We wouldn’t want the neighbours to post on the internet that they lived next to a space alien, now would we?

I shut the back door, turned to the garden, and took a deep breath of frigid air.

Autumn had arrived early, in a blush of reds and yellows and brilliant oranges on the boughs beyond our garden. The big tree in the garden itself was holding on valiantly, but even those leaves were starting to turn. A riot of colour lay still as a painting against clear blue skies, cold and crisp, light and fluffy upon the rooftops of Sharrowford beyond. A few stray spirits crossed those rooftops, far away.

It was September. A Friday. The academic year at Sharrowford University would begin in just over two weeks, on the first of October. I was enrolled for my second year of a degree in English Literature.

This time last year I had been arriving in Sharrowford. I had believed myself fragile, alone, and insane.

I filled my lungs, held the breath, and stretched out all my briefly-invisible tentacles, allowing myself a soft whine deep down in my throat.

When I lowered my eyes to the garden, I discovered that I had some unexpected company. Framed by the overgrown grass and the riot of fascinating weeds in the flowerbeds, beneath the cool shelter of the shadow cast by the gnarled old tree in which Tenny's cocoon had once lain, were two familiar figures, one standing, the other crouching, with something cradled in the latter's lap.

"Zheng!" I called, surprised to see her back in the garden so soon. "And ... Grinny?"

Zheng heard my voice and looked my way. She broke into a toothy grin, full of sharp glints in the sunlight. "Shaman! Come see our bounty!"

Steeling my stomach against the inevitable sight and smell of whatever raw meat the pair had brought home this time, I stepped off the patio and onto the unkempt grass of the lawn, heading over to the tree.

Zheng was standing, dressed in her usual baggy layers, boots covered in woodland mud, dark hair and reddish brown skin kissed hard by the cold sunlight. Grinny — the Grinning Demon who we had rescued from Edward Lilburne, now Zheng's constant companion — was squatting with something held in her lap. She was dressed a little more neatly than Zheng, having expressed a fondness for tracksuits and jogging bottoms. She was still completely bald, head like a shiny egg, but somehow she made it work. Twin pools of blood-red eyes glanced up at me as I approached, framed by the curling black of her horns. Her mouth split wide to show rows of sharp teeth, proud of whatever prey she'd caught.

"Good afternoon, Grinny," I said, carefully bracing myself for whatever puddle of gore I would find in her hands. "I take it you two had a good ... hunt? Oh! Oh my! Hello?"

I squeaked in surprise, tentacles going everywhere.

A tiny red-brown snout peered over the edge of Grinny's arm, followed by two little clawed paws. Beady black eyes fixed on mine for a heartbeat, framed by a swish of dark red tail. The face vanished, trailed by the tail, as the owner of both scurried up inside Grinny's tracksuit top. She burst into peals of laughter, cradling the surprise visitor inside of her clothes.

I stood, mouth agape, eyes wide.

"A rare find," Zheng purred. "No, Shaman?"

Grinny looked so proud.

"I ... um ... I didn't quite get a good look, was that ... a red squirrel?"

"Yes," Zheng purred. "A little wanderer. A little lonely. But lonely no longer, perhaps?"

I laughed as well, boggling at both of the demons. "How on earth did you two find a red squirrel this far south? Don't tell me you've just sprinted to Scotland and back? Even you couldn't do that, Zheng."

"I could try."

"Found him!" Grinny said. "In the woods! All alone!"

"The puppy," Zheng rumbled — by which she meant Tenny, "was educating the little one here," (by which she meant Grinny,) "on the subject of English wildlife. This forlorn weakling had to be found. Sheltered. Protected."

"Greys would bully!" Grinny said, petting the squirrel under her top. The animal shifted a little. Grinny giggled, a wet and toothy sound.

Zheng sighed. "I am not allowed to eat this one. A pity."

"Not eating!" Grinny snapped at her. "No!"

"Just so," Zheng purred.

"What are you going to do with him?" I asked.

"Look after," Grinny told me. "In woods."

Zheng rumbled a wordless sound and placed a hand on the back of my neck. She gently drew me closer, then planted a kiss on my forehead. She smelled of blood and meat and earth, but her clothes were mercifully clean. I gave her a quick hug.

"You're not coming in?" I asked.

Zheng shrugged. "The little one is restless. Your twin?"

I shook my head. "You think I'd be out here by myself if she was talking? No. I'm in enforced self-care mode. Enforced by Praem, that is."

"Good." Zheng grunted, raising her eyes to the house. "Here she is. You have strayed too far, shaman."

"Ah?"

When I glanced back at the house, Praem was visible through the glass of the back door. She'd been about to open it and call for me. I raised a hand to let her know I was on my way.

From the garden, Number 12 Barnslow Drive was beautiful. The cold sunlight soaked into the tiles on her roof, reflecting off the patches of blue tarpaulin, ready for the much-needed work to be done up there over the following weeks; roofing repairs were well overdue. Her dark windows were like heavily lidded eyes, dozing off in front of a fire. Her bricks seemed soft to the touch, as if they would yield like skin. All her little external details — her drainpipes, her door handles, the open palm of the patio, the glass of the windows, the flanks which led around to the front — filled me with a sense of belonging.

I'd lived here for less than one twentieth of my life, but this house felt more like home than anywhere else.

Except maybe the lightless waters of the abyss.

“Don’t stay out too long, Zheng. Love you,” I said as I turned to leave, our fingers interlinked for a few moments. “And um, Grinny, good luck with looking after the squirrel. Let me know what you name ... him? Her?”

“Hims! Squirrel!” Grinny said with a wet cackle.

Praem awaited me at the back door, her black and white maid uniform framed by the shadowy interior of the utility room. She opened the door for me and ushered me inside, greeting Zheng and Grinny with a stare. I slipped my shoes off, grateful to be back inside the familiar warmth of the house.

Lunch was served, steaming softly on the kitchen table, filling the air with the scent of eggs and lemon and a seductive hint of smoked salmon; Praem had used the entire packet of the latter. I was salivating before I even got my backside into a chair, feeling like an aquarium squid at feeding time, wiggling all our tentacles with involuntary excitement.

I was not allowed to pick up my plate and rush upstairs to eat in Maisie’s room, as I had taken all my meals in that fashion for the last week. Praem didn’t have to say so, and I was not foolish enough to ask. She simply stared at me for a few moments until I picked up my fork and got started.

“Chew properly,” she said.

“I will, I will!” I replied around a mouthful of lemon-drenched fish. “I promise! No rushing, I promise.”

Praem turned away and set about cleaning the kitchen.

We — I, me, us, nine of us coiled about each other inside one physical form — weren’t lying about that promise, either. We tried, very hard, to pace ourselves and eat with a reasonable degree of leisure, no matter how our eyes felt magnetically drawn to the ceiling, on the other side of which our sister waited for our return. As we ate, we pricked up our ears, trying to discern from among the myriad little noises of the house any hint of raised voices from up there, or the beginning of a triumphant rush down the stairs, or an excited trill from Tenny. We were being rather silly, of course; we didn’t doubt the whole house would know at the very moment of the slightest change in my twin’s countenance. Evelyn’s comfy nap would surely be interrupted by Tenny at full trumpet-blast volume, shaking the window panes and shivering the bricks.

When Praem finished cleaning up the kitchen, she sat down opposite me, with her hands folded upon the tabletop.

“You, um ... ” I said, swallowing a mouthful of scrambled egg. “You don’t have to watch me eat, Praem.”

“I do not have to,” she confirmed. “Yes.”

I sighed, smiling ruefully at myself. “Thank you, by the way. For lunch, I mean. Thank you for all the cooking you do around here, Praem. I hope you know how much we all appreciate you. I never want to take you for granted.”

“I do.”

“I’m sort of hoping that over this coming year I can learn to do a bit more cooking myself. Things should be a bit quieter from now on.” I frowned at my own words. “Um, to put it lightly.”

Praem raised one elegant hand and rapped a knuckle against the wooden tabletop.

“Ah? Praem?”

“Touch wood.”

“Oh! Oh, right, yes.” I tapped the tabletop myself, hewing to the ancient superstition; I hoped my words had not jinxed us, though I struggled to imagine how any year of my future life could be as stressful and busy and difficult as the one which I had just passed through. Was that the voice of youthful naivety? Several of us agreed; that was too much of an assumption to make. Don’t tempt fate. “Touch wood, indeed,” I agreed. “Well said. Thank you.”

“You are welcome.”

I smiled across the tabletop, then set about scooping up the last few mouthfuls of this extravagant lunch.

When I was down to just one spoonful of baked beans and a crust of cheese toastie, we heard a key turn in the front door, followed by the familiar click of the lock, and a sudden clatter from two pairs of feet.

Praem stood up from the table, as if to greet guests, but by the familiar patter-stomp of trainers being kicked off, I knew exactly who had arrived home. My suspicions were confirmed a moment later by the soft cry of—

“I’m hooooome! With Jannyyyyy!”

—followed by the patter-step-skid of Lozzie bursting into the kitchen. Poncho all a-flutter, hair tousled by the wind, face a little red from the cold weather, she bounced over the kitchen threshold, then slammed to a halt and boggled at me.

Praem said, “Welcome home.”

“Hiiiiii Praem!” Lozzie chirped, then switched back to me again.

“Heathy! You’re eating in the kitchen, in the kitchen!”

“I’m under strict orders,” I said, swallowing my final mouthful of beans and gesturing at Praem. “And you know how Praem is, I can’t dare say no. I, um!” I stammered, suddenly blushing. “I mean that in a good way of course, Praem! Sorry!”

“No offense has been taken,” said Praem. “I am flattered.”

Lozzie crossed the kitchen in a series of little hops. She kissed me on the top of my head, then pattered around to Praem and hugged her tight, emitting a high-pitched “Mmmmmmm!”. Praem returned the hug.

Jan appeared in the kitchen doorway, eyes darting left and right, as if checking the corners for lurking fears.

“Hello, Jan,” I said, unable to keep the slightly exasperated amusement from my voice. “Good afternoon.”

Jan was not dressed in the armour she had worn in the dream, but she acted as if she was. Jan Martense, mage and mystery and self-made doll, was dressed in a two-piece pink tracksuit, with a white puffer jacket over the top, unzipped down the middle; this was not the gigantic armoured coat she’d worn upon certain previous visits to Number 12 Barnslow Drive, but it did match the style, despite terminating at her hips instead of turning her into a huge cartoon penguin. Jan had in fact worn that massive protective coat for the first three days of the last week, but eventually Lozzie had convinced her that the protection was not needed.

But still, I spotted a hint of straps and holsters inside the coat.

Jan met my eyes, jaw set, looking ready to bolt. “That ... that woman, she’s not here again, is she?”

I swallowed a sigh and turned it into a smile; Jan had asked that exact same question every single day for the last week, always the opening refrain of her regular visits. And always with the same answer. Some of us — three out of six tentacles — toyed with the idea of rushing up to her and tickling her under the armpits, just to make her relax. But that would be silly, not to mention an invasion of Jan’s personal space. The notion received a firm veto from the rest of us.

“No, Jan,” I said. “Taika’s not here. Taika was never here. She came to Wonderland directly, she never set foot in the house. How many times do I need to say this?”

Jan puffed out a breath she’d been holding, flapped her arms, and cleared her throat. “You don’t ... you don’t have to keep repeating that last part. I know that part. I just want to make sure she’s not, you know ... here.”

“Jan, if you feel ridiculous, you only have yourself to blame.” I paused and cleared my throat as well. “Sorry, that sounded more harsh than I intended it to be.”

Jan almost laughed. “I don’t care about feeling ridiculous. I care about not having to deal with that ... person.”

Lozzie disengaged from Praem and pattered over, slipping behind Jan and sliding her arms over Jan’s shoulders. “Jannyyyyy,” she purred, eyes closed in relaxation. “Taika’s fiiiine, she’s not scary at all!”

Jan swallowed, looking distinctly uncomfortable. “You don’t know her like I do, Lozzie. I wish you wouldn’t ... ”

Jan trailed off.

“Jan,” I said. “You don’t have to worry about that here. In Sharrowford, but especially in this house, you’re under our protection. I don’t understand what history you and Taika have, or what your disagreements are about, but she’s not going to lay a finger on you.”

Jan shot me a sceptical look. “I’m not worried about getting shanked. Hell, I’d like to see her try. I’d lay her out flat. No, I’m worried about getting drawn into an interminable philosophical argument which should have been forgotten a long time ago.” Jan sighed, patted one of Lozzie’s hands, and made an effort to smile. “Look, let’s not linger on that. Let’s talk about happier matters.” Jan’s smile turned genuine. “How’s sleeping beauty? Any change?”

I shrugged as I stood up from the table, my lunch finally all comfy down in my tummy. “Same pace as the rest of the week, I think. Do you want to come see her? Say hi?”

“I most certainly do!” Jan beamed at me. She gently peeled Lozzie’s arms off her shoulders, but held her hand instead. “Let’s go see our patient.”

Lozzie and Jan trooped out of the kitchen and back into the front room, hand-in-hand. On the first few days Jan had waited for somebody else to take the lead, but Lozzie had a way of enforcing domestic familiarity. I glanced at Praem for permission to join them.

“Lunch is complete,” she said. “You may return.”

Jan and Lozzie were already halfway up the stairs by the time I caught them; Jan had paused to leave her coat by the door. Praem trailed behind, attending to some other matter, probably intending to go wake Evee shortly. We emerged into the upstairs corridor, passed several of the bedrooms, the open door to the bathroom, the clean, clear, sunlight pouring through the single window, and made our way almost to the corner.

That was where Praem had cleared out a room for Maisie.

Lozzie and Jan went in first. I followed, still with a hitch to my heartbeat and a catch in my throat, despite an entire week of this routine.

The room — on the same side of the house as Evelyn’s bedroom — did not yet contain very much of note. Maisie did not yet own anything, with no books or clothes or plush animals or any possessions with which to express and define herself. But we’d done what we could to brighten up the space; we didn’t want her to awaken to blank walls and empty shelves. The bed covers were a riot of pinks and lilacs, donated by Evelyn, watched over by a pair of plush sheep detached from the mass of Evelyn’s collection. Several yellow drapes hung from the walls, borrowed with great enthusiasm from Seven's new room at the rear of the house, reflecting the bright and cheery sunlight that poured in from the window, filling the room with a familiar yellow glow. The floor boasted not one, but two nice thick fluffy rugs, currently accompanied by a bedroll on which I had been sometimes sleeping. A bookshelf stood opposite the bed; the books within were rather thin on the ground for now, mostly second-hand copies of novels I recalled from our shared childhood, along with many of my own favourites. A desk had been rescued from one of the old rooms at the rear of the house, though we couldn't figure out what to put on yet, so it seemed a bit sparse. The only important thing on the desk was a small plate with a pebble in the middle — The Pebble, the one I had pressed into Maisie's fist at the end of the dream.

One of the rugs was currently occupied by Tenny and Twil, both sitting cross-legged on some cushions. A chess set lay discarded to one side. A spread of playing cards formed a wall between the two.

"Hey hey hey! Hey there Jan." Twil broke into a grin when the three of us bundled through the doorway. Her wolfish ears stood up and her tail started wagging; she had retained those pneumatic additions after the dream of Cygnet, and preferred to keep them present, at least when she wasn't out in public. "Is it that time already? Time for the regular check up?"

"That time again," Jan said. "Twil, Tenny." She nodded at the pair in turn, passing them by and striding over to the bed. "Maisie, hello. Only me again."

Lozzie flopped down, arms over Tenny's shoulders, peering at the playing cards in Tenny's hand. Tenny returned the hug with half a dozen tentacles. "What'cha playing, Tenns?"

"Winning!" Tenny trilled, a big smile on her face, tentacles wiggling everywhere. "Brrrrrrt!"

Twil blew out a big puff, but she was still smiling too. "Yeah, no kidding. It's Blackjack, sort of. I won two hands, but I think Tenny learned how to count cards after that. I've got no hope here."

"Maffs!" Tenny giggled. "Can go back to chess if you want, Twil? Beat you harder?"

Twil rolled her eyes. "I like you better when we're playing Minecraft."

Lozzie giggled, hugging Tenny, rubbing her cheek against Tenny's face. Twil made some clever quip, grinning when Lozzie giggled all the harder. Tenny revealed her hand, and won, again.

I passed by, lingering only to briefly touch tentacles with Tenny, following Jan over to the large, comfortable bed which dominated one side of the room. It was not flush against the wall, but pulled out slightly, so that any observer might make a complete circuit of the bed, to peer at the recumbent occupant from any desired angle. This process of regular examination was becoming less and less necessary, but Jan had silently determined that she wasn't going to stop the inspections, not until the process was well and truly complete, without any doubts left. I understood why, even if it was only for her own sake, but I appreciated the expert opinion.

Lying on the bed, with the covers pulled up over her chest, her eyes closed in something akin to repose, was Maisie.

She looked exactly like me — minus my various abyssal additions, my six tentacles, my chromatophores, and the lines of all my habitual expressions etched into the curves and muscles of my face. She was tiny beneath the covers, so very petite, just like me. She had my narrow jaw, my dark lashes, my neat nose, my curled lips, the softness of my cheeks, all of me, reflected.

The only major difference was the same one which had been revealed upon her rescue. Her hair was extremely long, currently coiled across one side of the bed, to keep it out of the way.

She was no longer thin with metaphysical malnutrition, no longer pale and drained by a decade of isolation, sensory deprivation, and imprisonment, no longer slack with inner exhaustion. I had to remind myself that she had technically never been any of those things in the first place, that had been the language of a dream, the language of a Cygnet Hospital which was never real. Maisie's physical form in that place had been only memory and metaphor. This — her, in that bed, right in front of my eyes — was the real thing.

She was dressed in plain pajama bottoms, borrowed from Evelyn, and a long-sleeved t-shirt, borrowed from me.

A fragment of yellow cloth was wrapped around her right wrist, satin-smooth, tied into a bouncy little bow. Sometimes only I could see that sliver of yellow fabric; sometimes it was plain for any unaltered eyes, visible to all. Sometimes it was made of silk, sometimes cotton, sometimes a kind of unnatural gossamer which faded beneath the sunlight. But it always came back. This was the fragment of my yellow membrane which I had gifted to Maisie in the dream, the piece of me which had helped carry her to the surface of the waters. Nobody had even voiced the prospect of removing it.

And, cradled in her left arm, pressed gently to her chest, just over her heart, was the Praem Plushie. Another survivor from Cygnet.

Maisie was breathing, slowly, softly, as if in a very deep sleep.

She'd only been breathing for six days. On the day I had returned and first laid eyes on her, she hadn't finished growing an approximation of her lungs.

I sank into the armchair by the head of the bed, careful not to dislodge the book resting on one arm.

"Hello," I said to her sleeping face, both brightly and bravely. I did not have to fake any fraction of my tone. The mere sight of her filled me with hope and cheer. "I'm back! I was only gone for a little while. I mean, you heard what I said before I left, you know what I was doing. Lunch was great, Praem is an excellent cook, I can't praise her enough, really. I can't wait for you to try her cooking. You're going to love it, though I don't think you'll need quite as much lemon as I do. Oh, and I popped outside, too! I mean, uh, not 'Outside' outside, not to another dimension, I mean out into the garden. Zheng was out there with Grinny. They've caught a red squirrel! Not to eat it, but to ... protect it? I think? I have no idea how they found one so far south. But it's kind of heart-warming, actually. Maybe a pet, something to care for, maybe that's what Grinny needs. I hope it helps her."

As I spoke to the unresponsive face of my sister, Jan took a circuit around the bed. She pulled out her mobile phone and started comparing Maisie's sleeping form with the catalogue of photos she'd taken over the last twenty four days, checking on her from all different angles. She lifted a handful of Maisie's hair and felt all along the length of her left arm, fingers sinking into the skin. She peered into Maisie's ears, gently peeled open an eyelid to stare into the depths beneath, and carefully pulled her jaw down to examine her mouth and tongue. Jan used a timer on her phone to measure

Maisie's breaths, and even put one ear to her chest, listening to the strong, steady pump of her heart.

I'd done that a dozen times this last week. I couldn't help myself.

As Jan drew near the end of her check-up — which I knew was approaching, because we'd done it so many times now — I said: "Jan, are you certain she can hear us?"

Jan paused, eyebrows raised, then pulled a smirk. "Now who's repeating needless questions?"

"I just ... I like to be sure."

Jan patted Maisie's right hand. "I'm sure she can hear us, Heather. When I was in her position, my senses came back a lot faster than my fine motor function. I could hear blurred sounds for ... well, for a lot longer than Maisie's been lying here. I can't guarantee she's following the exact same process of bodily inhabitation that I did, but yes, I'm certain she can hear us talking."

I frowned up at Jan, sitting on the edge of my chair. "Senses came back faster than motor function?"

"That's ... what I said, yes?"

"Then how do you explain the ... running ... thing?"

Jan sighed. "I don't. Heather, come on, putting souls into physical vessels isn't exactly a production line process. She's one of a kind. Bespoke. It's her body, she may have had to do some ... adjustments. I don't know. Okay? And it's not happened again. Relax. She knows you're here, she knows she's cared for."

"I keep worrying that she was panicking or something ... "

"She probably was," Jan said. "I know I did. But then she calmed down. She knows she's in safe hands, Heather. She can hear you."

I nodded, then reached out and briefly touched Maisie's right hand, where it lay on the bedsheets.

"So, uh," I tried to ask, nodding at Jan's mobile phone. "Any change?"

"Actually no," Jan said, gesturing at 'our patient'. "She's not changed from yesterday's check-up, not at all. I don't spot any further changes to the surface of her skin, no new pores, nothing added, not even a hair. Her breathing is normal, heartbeat's normal. She's got saliva, earwax, and I think I could even hear a digestive gurgle or two. Good for her."

"Oh," I said, alarmed. "Does she need to eat? She won't starve, will she?"

Jan shook her head. "I doubt her digestion is actually functioning yet. And she's showing no signs of dehydration, she doesn't need to intake water, not until all this, you know, comes online, as it were." Jan shook her head. "Frankly I'm surprised she's still sleeping."

"Really?" I asked. "Could something be wrong?"

"Nothing serious. The doll-joints still show when you look closely, but that's something she'll have to learn to consciously adjust, she's not awake enough to change it. So, yeah, I think her pneumasomatic layer is done. Twenty four days! Tell you what, Heather, I am jealous." Jan almost laughed. "Took me ... well, a lot longer. I'm glad my craft work could spare her those difficulties."

"How much longer?" I asked, squeezing my hands together, twisting my tentacles into knots.

Jan glanced back at Lozzie and Tenny and Twil, to make sure all three were engrossed with the mess of the card game. When she spoke again, she lowered her voice.

"I haven't a clue. It took me a lot longer than this, in my own body." She waggled a hand, her own doll-joints showing at wrist and knuckles. "But then I wasn't exactly undergoing the transfer in optimal conditions. I was face down in a bad place, all by myself. Half the time, I thought I was actually dead. I had to rush, if I wanted to survive. I was up on my feet long before I was physically complete. Maisie here, she doesn't have that pressure. She's got a lot of advantages. She might simply be taking her time, in the knowledge that she's safe to do so. It might be better that way. She's skipping right over a lot of the problems I went through. No blindness. No spinal pain. No failed digestion. Not even the thing with my sense of touch being all upside down. And she's got actual physical remains, that's boosted the process in ways I never could have done myself, and—"

Jan must have caught a look I hadn't known I was wearing. She halted and cleared her throat.

“S-sorry,” I said. “I didn’t mean to seem worried.”

“It’s alright, Heather,” Jan said with an awkward smile. “Maisie’s doing great. Just give her time. Who knows, she might wake up in a day or two. Might be a week. But she’s in there, and she’s made incredible progress. I’m sure she’s just comfortably getting on with it.”

“I hope she is comfortable, yes.”

Maisie — my sister, my twin, my mirror-half — was, for want of better and more accurate terminology, ‘anchored’ inside the doll-body that Jan had engineered for this express purpose. Maisie had spent the last twenty four days instinctively building her outer layers and inner details from pneuma-somatic flesh, the hard and physical kind, the same kind of flesh which Jan had once desperately draped over her own emergency-escape body, the same kind of flesh that clothed Praem’s wooden core. Now she was complete, but not yet ready to awaken.

I had missed the dramatic moment of transubstantiation, the moment of Maisie’s return to the physical; I’d been busy swimming through the abyss. In a way I was glad that I had missed it — I don’t know if I could have kept myself together in the moments after the collapse of the Cygnet dream.

According to everybody else, the collapse of the dream of Cygnet Asylum had been horribly confusing, ejecting everybody back out onto the then-still blackened ash of Wonderland, complete with memories and knowledge of where I’d gone, but no sign of myself — and no sign of Maisie, even though they knew she should logically be present.

It was Eileen who had solved that mystery. As the great lid of the Eye had rolled back above Wonderland, Eileen had appeared among my very confused friends. She had prioritised constructing her own body, as rapidly as she could, because she had a delivery to make.

Eileen had presented to my friends a carefully cradled handful of fire-blackened scraps.

A few fragments of human bone, scorched and charred.

Maisie’s mortal remains.

According to Eileen’s rapid — and mercifully pun-free — explanation, Maisie's soul still clung to those chips of carbonised bone.

I had seen those pieces of bone, but I had not touched them. A picture had been taken, for the sake of my own knowledge, in case I needed closure. I don't know how I would have reacted to cradling those fragments in my own hands. But I hadn't needed to. Jan had worked fast, even disoriented from the dream and terrified out of her wits to find herself in Wonderland. Before the others had even regained their bearings, Jan had opened up the doll-body and added the bone fragments to the core of the magical mechanism, among the crystal innards which were meant to contain Maisie's mind and spirit.

Maisie's 'soul' (again, for want of better terminology) had quickly settled into her new vessel.

I had also missed most of the process by which she had built her pneuma-somatic outer layers. For the first few days — while the others had split their time between watching over her and preparing to dredge me from the abyss — Maisie had been nothing but a lifeless, faceless, seemingly empty doll, made of grey-on-grey carbon fibre. Slowly she had begun to take shape, first as a ghostly outline, still featureless and vague, but with increasing detail by the hour. After a week she had been solid enough to touch her skin. At ten days, everybody had agreed it was time to dress her in some clothing. Between the twelve and eighteen day mark, the process had turned rather gruesome — her facial features had to solidify from a shiny surface. I had missed most of that, but Jan had pictures, taken for entirely proper medical reasons. The pictures showed eyes like pinpricks, ears like twists of mangled flesh, a mouth formed from a lipless slash, and hair like bristles. Over time my own face had emerged from the warped lump of pneuma-somatic clay.

A few of the others had been surprised that Maisie did not have tentacles, like we did. But why should she? She had not traversed the abyss. She was not a Heather, not us. She was Maisie.

Over the days I had watched her, Maisie's skin had gone from a shiny, unyielding, too-perfect surface, to real human skin, with pores and little hairs and even a few moles. Her fingernails had finished emerging. The hair on her head had taken on full solidity. She had gained a pulse and a heartbeat and oils on her skin. She had started breathing, at which I almost climbed the walls in excitement. Sometimes her fingers twitched or her eyeballs moved behind the lids.

But still, she wouldn't wake.

Some of the others were worried she'd had a bad experience.

Back at the five day mark — another milestone I'd missed — Maisie had done something that Jan had not predicted, nor prepared for. She had surprised everybody, in a way that was meant to be impossible.

She had gotten up and sprinted for the front door.

This had come as a bit of a shock to everybody involved, especially because Maisie hadn't yet taken proper shape. She'd been nothing but a glossy, smooth, ghost-like illusion, wrapped around a skeletal doll made of carbon fibre. She hadn't possessed muscles or eyes, with no way of navigating or locomoting. According to Jan, the whole thing had been achieved via willpower alone, pneumasomatic motion, like a spirit bound to a lump of matter.

She had reached the front door quite quickly, before anybody could properly react. She'd gotten down the garden path, over the front wall, and out into the street. After twelve paces at a dead sprint, Zheng had finally caught her and bundled her back into the house.

Luckily nobody had witnessed this doll-jointed apparition loose and wild on a Sharrowford street; the whole episode had unfolded at about five o'clock in the morning, when few prying eyes were awake to see.

Maisie hadn't resisted being returned to her new room; in fact, she'd gone completely limp, just as she was before, as if the escape attempt had been some confused bodily reaction rather than an actual plan. Everybody was concerned she might try it again, or that she was suffering somehow. Jan was encouraged by this — it was a good sign, technically — but also shared in the others' concern. They had redoubled the watch inside her bedroom, and made sure the Praem Plushie was propped in her arms at all times.

We — me, I, us — were worried as well.

But beneath that, we were also very proud. Our sister, our twin, our Maisie, full of life and energy, even if she now knew she had to wait before expending it on running about. We felt so proud of her, of what she was achieving — becoming herself.

Jan reached over and gently patted my arm, as we both stared down at Maisie. “She’s got the best care anybody could hope for, Heather. And she’s a lot more comfortable than I ever was.”

“Mm,” I murmured.

Jan cleared her throat, briefly glancing back at the others, before returning her eyes to me, down in the armchair. “Raine mentioned in passing that you called your parents again, yesterday?”

A sigh escaped my lips. Jan had phrased it as a question, but I didn’t want to think about that right then. I wanted to focus on Maisie.

Jan waited a moment, then added: “It might be pertinent to Maisie. That’s the only reason I ask. Raine gave me the gist, but, you know.”

“The second attempt, yes,” I said, feeling my throat tighten. “It didn’t ... they didn’t ... ”

“No luck?”

We shrugged, unable to face this now, not with Maisie herself needing so much attention. “They’re trying their best, but they only partially remember. My mother, she’s ... she’s got that notebook where she wrote down the truth, and she believes the stuff written in her own hand. But it’s like a dream for her. My father, he tried to sound stoic, but he’s ... oh, I don’t know. Both of them know Maisie exists, they accept it. But without any physical evidence, no return of her things, of proof she was ever alive, it’s hard for them to tell reality from a dream. They need something more.”

“They need to see her,” Jan said.

I nodded. “They do. When she’s awake. When she’s finished growing herself. Not like this. We don’t know if she’d even want that.”

Jan nodded, slowly. She didn’t say anything, neither argument nor agreement. After a long moment she gently patted me on the shoulder, then wandered over to where Lozzie was cooing at the card game between Tenny and Twil.

“That was Jan,” I said to Maisie, leaning forward. “I mean ... you know that was Jan, of course you do. Why am I telling you that?” I laughed softly, then settled back into the armchair, getting comfortable. We didn’t intend to get up for anything for the next while, not until we needed to use the toilet. “Do you want us to read to you some more?” I picked up the book from the arm of the chair and touched the bookmark. Watership Down. We were only a few chapters in. “I do hope you’re enjoying it, Maisie. I know it’s a heavy one, but it’s still one of my favourites, and I can’t help thinking it’s a bit like ... like ... well, you know.” I sighed. “Though, if you’re getting tired of it, we could switch out to something else. We’ve got all the books in the house to choose from, after all. I don’t mind reading something I’ve not read before, then we can both experience it for the first time, together! Praem’s good at suggesting books, she’s been reading so many this past year. Or we could always read The Hobbit a second time. There and back again. Just like you and me.”

I trailed off, staring at the mirror of Maisie’s face, at her eyelashes against her cheeks, at the slow rise and fall of her chest, the long brown tail of her hair lying on the pillow and across the sheets.

The Praem Plushie seemed to stare at me for a moment. I nodded and smiled to her; good job watching over Maisie, Praem.

Behind me, the card game was abandoned, and the others asked if I was okay by myself for a bit — I wasn’t really listening, but I gathered that Tenny wanted to show ‘Lozzie-mums’ and ‘Jannary’ something exciting on her laptop, while Twil needed to stretch her legs and fetch a snack, and probably sneak off to see Eevee, once Evelyn was awake. Of course I was okay! But I wasn’t by myself. There were nine of us in here, and Maisie was right in front of us.

The others went off. Twil paused to squeeze my shoulder. “She’ll be up and about in no time, Big H. Lookin’ forward to it.”

“Me too. Thank you, Twil.”

“Back in a bit!”

“Take your time,” I told her. “No rush.”

A few moments later, it was just us and Maisie, and the gentle play of sunlight across the wall. The little noises of Number 12 Barnslow Drive filtered through the walls and the floorboards — the murmur of distant voices, the tap of footsteps on the stairs, the occasional creak of old beams. The house herself seemed to lean close, cupping us between her hands. I could have napped, right there in the armchair. Our tentacles were coiled softly about us, relaxed and unhurried.

I let out a contented sigh leaning back in the armchair with the book in my lap.

"I hope you'll come to love this house as much as I do," I said to Maisie. "Not that you have to, of course. I have no idea what your tastes or feelings will be like, not exactly. You might not even want to stay here. Maybe you'll want to live with mum and dad, or maybe ..."

My throat tightened around those words. It wasn't time for that, not yet.

Maisie was home. Maisie was safe. Maisie would be awake, quite soon.

I opened Watership Down to where we'd left off. "Shall I keep reading, then?" I asked. "I shall, I think. Now, where were we? Oh, yes, here we are. The opening of chapter five. It was getting on towards moonset when they left the fields and entered the wood. Straggling, catching up with one another, keeping more or less together—"

For several minutes I concentrated on the words of the story, putting all material concerns out of my mind, sinking into a familiar old fiction that I had read half a dozen times already. I spoke clear and soft, and I even did the voices, letting the narrative fill the room. I did hope Maisie was enjoying the tale, even if it could get a little dark from time to time.

"They followed him through the fern and very soon came upon another, parallel path—"

"Heather?"

It is a strange thing, to hear yourself interrupted by your own voice.

For a split-second I had no idea what was happening; my name, pronounced in my own voice, interrupting my thoughts and my words. We had become used to such things, of course, for we were nine-in-one now, a spread of little Heathers on the inside. But this was not an internal interruption. It came from beyond us, impossible, absurd.

The book fell from my fingers and into my lap. My eyes flew wide. My mouth probably hung open, making me look rather silly.

Maisie's lips were parted, wide enough to whisper.

I shot upright in the chair, leaning forward, leaning over her, my own breath held tight for fear of interrupting the next word. When she didn't speak on, I thought it must have been a hallucination.

"Maisie!?" I whispered, as if we were children again, hiding under the blankets "Maisie, are you ... are you awake? Maisie? Was that you?"

Her fingers twitched; her lips moved. I reached forward, my own hand trembling so hard I could barely feel when I slipped my fingers around hers. Two tentacles joined us, curling about her wrist. All of us, all nine of us, poised over her, waiting for a response.

"Maisie?" we whispered. "Maisie?"

Her hand tightened on mine, fingers coiling inward. Her eyes shifted behind the closed lids — then the lids peeled back, lashes fluttering, muscles squinting against the light.

Maisie's eyes — my eyes, seen in a mirror — turned and looked at me. Deep and dark. Richest brown.

We were speechless. She was not.

"Of course I want to live here," Maisie said. Her voice was weak and dry, like my own voice had gone on a long journey and could not quite fit into the throat it had once occupied. "I want to stay ... wherever you are, Heather. I don't want to go anywhere away from you."

We are not ashamed that we started crying, not in the least. Tears ran down my cheeks, and into the smile on my lips.

"Welcome home, Maisie."

And then—

I am afraid that this is where I must leave you, at least for a short time, dear listener, dear reader, dear however-exactly-you-are—experiencing my words and thoughts, this rough record of my deeds, inscribed upon reality with all the unreliable contours of an imperfect memory.

Don't be afraid. This is not where my tale ends, not exactly, but it is the point at which I cease to be the most relevant one to tell it. I was never the centre of the universe; it only seemed that way, for this busiest year of my as-yet young life.

Does it feel odd to be so directly addressed? Don't be surprised. You'll make us all giggle! You can't seriously think that I wasn't aware of you this whole time. I've learned a trick or two from Seven-Shades-of-Sunlight, and another one or two from some of her siblings, and the less said about the methods of The King in Yellow, the better. The less I explain, the safer you will be. All you need to know is that you have my gratitude.

At the start of this account, I told you — yes, you — not to come here, whoever or whatever you are. To Sharrowford. To Barnslow Drive. To me and mine.

If you've made it all this way, perhaps you've seen how I changed, during this most busy year — from a scrap of quivering humanity, isolated and lonely and turned against ourselves, to what we are in the aftermath of our journey, nine-in-one, one-as-nine, Homo abyssus, sat beside the bed of our twin sister. Perhaps you have some sensible reckoning of what we are, and what we are capable of, and who stands at our side in turn. Perhaps you've seen that we don't have to be so afraid of each other — those of us who inhabit this supernatural underworld, by choice or otherwise, with or without quests and great tasks of our own, those of us 'In The Know'.

So, it is with open hands that I amend my previous statement.

You're welcome to visit Sharrowford. Under my protection, or the protection of Evelyn Saye, or perhaps under the protection of other entities who you may wish to invoke. There are plenty to choose from, after all.

Tread lightly, be polite, and you will be very welcome.

But I can't promise it won't be busy. My story may be complete for now, but there are so many more to tell, here in Sharrowford, for those of us In The Know, for those whom I hold close. And that is why I must leave you, for a time. I must leave the boards of the stage for those better suited to tell their own stories.

Which stories, you may ask?

I suspect you have some inkling of the answer to that question; you're not a fool, if you've made it all this way. I've not exactly been subtle. Even here, at the end of 'my' story, we are still surrounded by many who deserve their own chance to grow, not least Maisie herself. Tenny needs an education, if she is to have a future. Zheng is still caged by circumstances that I, sadly, have not been the best to address. Twil, just about to start university herself, leads such a busy life sometimes. Kimberly, Felicity, Nicole — there's a love triangle I do not wish to interrupt, if it counts as a triangle at all. What of Eileen's daughter? No, I won't tell you her name, that would spoil the surprise, I'll let her do it herself! What of the King and his other children, not least the irascible Heart, who you may remember quite well. Ah, and then there's Jan, with far too many secrets of her own.

I can't even list them all, because I don't know! I'm not an omniscient eyeball in the sky, and these aren't my stories to tell.

But we'll be here. Maisie and I both. We aren't going anywhere.

See you soon, observer.